ON THE EDGE OF AL-QAIDA?
ASSESSING AL-QAIDA‘S CHANGING ROLE IN TERRORIST ATTACKS AND PLOTS OVER TIME

Luke M. Gerdes, PhD

University of Pittsburgh, 2012

This dissertation investigates changes in the extent and nature of al-Qaida‘s involvement in Salafist-motivated terrorism over time. It makes use of an original, hand-coded dataset that examines relationships among individuals involved in terror events in order to build a formal network-based model of violent extremist organizations‘ membership. These designations serve as the basis for a procedure that estimates the extent of organizations‘ functional involvement in more than 500 completed terror attacks, as well as approximately 180 incomplete terror plots. According to these quantitative estimates, al-Qaida‘s role in Islamist terrorism is far less substantial than often assumed by the press and policy makers, but in order to more fully explore changes in the organization‘s pattern of involvement in terrorism, the study‘s quantitative findings also served as a metric for the selection of qualitative cases, which were examined using structured-focused comparison. This narrative assessment reinforced the conclusions of the quantitative estimate, and found that the quality and capability of al-Qaida‘s operatives has steadily declined over time, even as the depth of al-Qaida‘s involvement with so-called partner organizations has waned. Because al-Qaida is not the global Islamist juggernaut it is often portrayed to be, the United States‘ already well-designed counterterrorism strategy requires minor amendment in order to better target the myriad terror groups that comprise the contemporary Islamist threat.

1.0 CLASSIFYING AL-QAIDA

Effective organizations must evolve in response to shifts in their environment.[1] Given the tremendous changes to al-Qaida's strategic context that have occurred since 1998, when the organization first gained international notoriety for bombing two United States Embassies in Eastern Africa, it should come as no surprise that al-Qaida looks different today than it did more than a decade earlier. For example, in 2001, the U.S. deprived al-Qaida of its safe-haven in Afghanistan in response to the 9/11 attacks, only to open a new front for Islamist extremism two years later by invading Iraq. As best demonstrated by the arrest of Khalid Sheikh Mohamed in 2003[2] and the death of Usama bin Laden in 2011,[3] al-Qaida has also lost senior leaders, but others have risen to take their place and have reshaped al-Qaida in the process.[4] In order to understand these changes, it is necessary to accurately classify the nature and extent of al-Qaida's involvement in plots and attacks over time. This task is the central focus of this study.

A number of scholars have made contributions that assist in the process. The first section following this introduction charts the evolution of terror-classification systems from simple two-

[4] For example, Adnan G. el-Shukrijumah was unknown at the time of the 9/11 attacks, but by 2010 he had become prominent enough within bin Laden's organization that FBI agents stated that "He would be equated with being chief of (al-Qaida) operations." tiered characterizations, to more nuanced three-tiered characterizations, to Bale's expansive six-tiered characterization, before concluding that the relative frequency of the patterns these systems describe remain unknown because none of the existing typologies have been broadly implemented. Typologists' failure to apply their classification systems is somewhat understandable, because practical data restrictions greatly complicate the process of studying terrorism through a wide lens. These obstacles are the subject of the second section, which outlines gaps and problems in existing datasets that attempt to address the breadth of Islamist terrorism. The third section describes how this study attempts to overcome these information gaps by using a novel adaptation of anthropological sampling method. Because methodological perspective always colors the collection and interpretation of data, the fourth section introduces Dynamic Network Analysis (DNA) and briefly discusses its interaction with the data sample, before the fifth section returns to questions of theory and draws on the existing terrorism literature to build an ontology of relationship types that clarifies the nature of al-Qaida's involvement in terror events. This perspective is then synthesized with aspects of network theory and the existing typological literature in order to offer a testable system that classifies the nature and scale of al-Qaida's involvement in terror attacks and plots. In order to explain the implementation of this typology, the sixth and final section outlines the contents and progression of this study's remaining chapters.

Before proceeding with an assessment of the existing literature, it is necessary to include a brief note on terminology. The vocabulary the scholarly community uses to discuss violence perpetrated in the name of Islam is inherently imprecise. Terms like extremist, Islamist, jihadist, salafist, terrorist, and insurgent are often used interchangeably, although it is possible (and often appropriate) to draw finite definitional divisions between these and other similar terms.[5] Unfortunately, confusion endures because there are no unanimously accepted definitions of these and related terms.

Analysts often use the same word to reference wildly different ideas, resulting in a phenomenon that Kenney dubs ―conceptual lumping."[6] The term ―jihad" provides a useful illustration. According to strict translation from the original Arabic, ―jihad" is synonymous with generic struggle.[7] However, Islamic scholars have redefined the term depending on their political and cultural context, often to justify violence against political opponents on religious grounds.[8] Consequently, many analysts, especially those hailing from the West, interpret the term ―jihad" as a synonym for holy war, while many Muslims continue to define ―jihad" in more classical terms, as an internal struggle for piety that has virtually nothing to do with the conduct of religious violence against non-believers.[9] Given the stark differences between these definitions, it requires little imagination to envision the analytic ambiguities that arise when readers fail to understand which concept authors intended to reference when they used the term ―jihad."

On the other hand, scholars have also invented a wealth of conflicting terminology to describe identical concepts. The Welsh scholar Phil Williams provides one relevant example in his effort to catalogue the various types of Violent Non-State Actors (VNSAs). He lists warlords, militias, and paramilitary forces as classes of ―private military forces" previously described within the academic literature, but argues convincingly that there are negligible differences between these categories.[10] Indeed, the primary distinction between a warlord's forces and a militia seems to be the presence of a charismatic leader, namely the warlord. Because Williams ultimately states that "the distinction between militias and paramilitaries is not entirely clear," he suggests that these terms are nearly perfect synonyms, despite scholars' tendency to view "militias" and "paramilitaries" as distinct categories of analysis.[11] In short, this example highlights the excessively jargonistic nature of the literature on religious, political, and criminal violence by demonstrating that scholars in the field have an unfavorable tendency to draw pedantic and largely subjective delineations between equivalent terms.

This analysis attempts to occupy a middle ground between conceptual lumping and the sort of false differentiation Williams describe by explicitly defining the handful of pseudo-technical terms that are unavoidable in inquiries of this type. Though other analysts may offer competing definitions, the list below specifies how key terms should be interpreted within the context of this analysis.

- Terrorism is defined as the conduct or attempted conduct of violence against non-combatants, broadly defined to include government personnel and soldiers serving outside of active war-zones.[12]

- Insurgency is defined as the organized use of force in an effort to seize power and/or territory from an existing government.[13]

[12] This definition draws heavily on that offered by the U.S. National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC), which defines non-combatants to include "military personnel and assets outside war zones and war-like settings," and which also explicitly recognizes that the dividing line between terrorism and other related forms of violence is subjective and difficult to determine. See, U.S. National Counterterrorism Center, 2010 Report on Terrorism, April 30, 2011, p. 1; available online: http://www.nctc.gov/witsbanner/docs/2010_report_on_terrorism.pdf.
[13] This definition is based on Williams' synthesis of existing definitions offered by the U.S. Department of Defense. Although he neglects to provide citations for the directly quoted souces listed below, the publications he cites are Joint Publication 3-24 – Counterinsurgency Operations, which defines insurgency as the "organized use of subversion and violence by a group or movement that seeks to overthrow or force change of a governing authority" (p. xi), and Army Field Mannual 100-20 – Military Operations in Low Intensity Conflict, which states that "An insurgency is an organized, armed political struggle whose goal may be the

- Jihad is defined in accordance with the typical Western understanding of the concept, which equates jihad with holy war.[14] Jihad is intended to be understood as a broader concept than either terrorism or insurgency that often incorporates aspects of both.

- Jihadists are defined as those individuals who actively pursue holy war through direct or indirect involvement in terrorism and/or insurgency.

- Salafism is defined as a puritanical brand of Islam that seeks to emulate the religious practices of the earliest Muslims.[15] Because several salafist preachers believe that violence against civilians is an illegitimate means to advance their interpretation of Islam, salafism is not synonymous with terrorism or jihad. Put more simply, salafism is a religious ideology that has both violent and non-violent variants.[16]

- Salafists are defined as those individuals who practice salafism.

- Islamists are defined as adherents to fundamental interpretations of Islam that place particular emphasis on the imposition of Islamic religious law (Sharia). Unless modified with additional descriptors, this term is intended to broadly reference adherents of puritanical Islam.[17] seizure of power through revolutionary takeover and replacement of the existing government. In some cases, however, an insurgency's goals may be more limited. For example, the insurgency may intend to break away from government control and establish an autonomous state within traditional ethnic or religious territorial bounds. The insurgency may also only intend to extract limited political concessions unattainable through less violent means" (p. 2-0). The Joint Publication and Army Field Mannual can be respectively found at: http://www.dtic.mil/doctrine/new_pubs/jp3_24.pdf and http://www.enlisted.info/field-manuals/fm-100-20-military-operations-in-low-intensity-conflict.shtml.

[14] Although religious scholars disagree with this convention, a number of prominent scholars within the security community use jihad and holy war as interchangeable terms. For example, Simon and Benjamin explicitly define jihad as "Islamic holy war" (p. 5). Similarly, Fawas A. Gerges equates jihad to "armed struggle" (The Far Enemy: Why Jihad Went Global, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005), p. 1). Finnaly, James JF Forest argues that jihad is a practice which "incorporates warfare with an individual effort to live a holy life," ("Training Camps and Other Centers of Learning," in James JF Forest (ed.), Teaching Terror: Strategic and Tactical Learning in the Terrorist World, (Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2006, p. 70).

[15] Simon and Benjamin, p. 491.

[16] Kenney, pp. 27-29.

[17] Conceptions of the terms "Islamist" are exceptionally broad, but center around the themes encapsulated in the general definition provided by this analysis. For example, Benjamin and Simon define Islamists as those who believe in "a religious ideology that insists on the application of sharia law by the state" (p. 490). Kumar Ramakrishna argues that salafists become Islamists when they "see it as an added obligation to actively seek recourse to political power in order to impose their belief system on the society at large" (emphasis in the original, "The Making of the Jemaah Islamiyah Terrorist," in James JF Forest (ed.), Teaching Terror: Strategic and Tactical Learning in the Terrorist World, (Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2006, p. 229). Habeck makes a similar argument, stating that Islamists are adherents of a reformist vision of Islam "that calls for a revival of the religion and a 'return' of Islam to political power," while noting that Islamists hail from myriad "often antagonistic groups with differeing beliefs, goals, and methodologies for attaining their ends" (p. 4). Gerges uses the term "Islamist" as a perfect synonym for "Islamic militant" and traces the rise of contemporary Islamists to 1967 military losses Arab states suffered to Israel, after which Islamists "launched a frontal assault against the failed ideologies of nationalism, socialism, communism, and 'decadent' Western liberalism in a daring bid to overthrow Muslim rulers and establish

Finally, the definition of the term "al-Qaida" also merits explicit definition. Although analysts often use the word to reference both the broader Islamist extremist movement and regional affiliates of the organization Usama bin Laden founded,[18] this study does not. As the second chapter describes in detail, this study defines "al-Qaida" as the core group of supporters surrounding bin Laden and his successor, Ayman al-Zawahiri. Unless otherwise noted, regional organizations which include the term "al-Qaida" in their name, such as al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb and al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula, should be understood as distinct entities.

1.1 THE EVOLUTION OF TERROR TYPOLOGIES

Efforts to differentiate between the nature and extent of al-Qaida's involvement in terrorism almost always come down to questions of categorization. The protracted and increasingly personal debate that Marc Sageman and Bruce Hoffman regarding the relative importance of "top down" and "bottom up" terrorist organizations provides a useful starting point. While Sageman advocated that 'leaderless' self-organizing jihadists are the foremost threat within the violent Islamist movement,[19] he acknowledged that formal, established jihadist groups still exist and pose a legitimate, if lesser, danger, which "will grow if vigilance is relaxed."[20] Hoffman, by contrast, acknowledged the existence of the local, largely autonomous ad hoc groups that worried Sageman, and even went so far as to state that "bin Laden and his lieutenants have engineered nothing short of a stunning transformation of Al Qaeda from the more or less unitary, near bureaucratic entity it once had been to something more akin to an ideology."[21] However, Hoffman still vociferously contended that formal terror organizations, most especially the core group of al-Qaida members surrounding bin Laden, represent the greater threat to global security.[22] Ultimately, the Hoffman-Sageman debate was over the relative dangers that hierarchical terror organizations and self-organizing jihadist groups present, but both men tacitly agreed that violent Islamists fell into one of these two categories.[23]

Other analysts made similar implicit divisions, which rather than emphasizing the distinction between grassroots jihadists and established terror groups, highlighted the differences between al-Qaida and regional groups, which have often (but not always) adopted names that suggest ties to bin Laden's organization, such al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), al-Qaida in Iraq (AQI), and al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Terrorism studies is an unforgivably jargonistic field, so vocabulary disputes abound, but the term "franchise model" is fairly widely used to describe this school of thinking.[24]

John Simpson, the BBC's longtime world affairs editor, traced the origins of this intellectual model to the immediate aftermath of 9/11, when Frank Gardner, another well-regarded BBC journalist with decades of experience in the Middle East, popularized the idea that McCants is affiliated with the Combatting Terrorism Center at West Point, one of the leading research groups on the subject of Islamist extremism.

[24] For an example of the franchise metaphor's use by American policy makers, see, Alfred De Montesquiou, "Official: Al-Qaeda like a fast food franchise for terrorism," USA Today, June 7, 2009; available online: http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/2009-06-07-al-qaeda_N.htm. Examples of the franchise metaphor's use to describe al-Qaida's relationship to specific groups includes: Emily Hunt, "Al-Qaeda's North African Franchise: The GSPC Regional Threat," (Policy Watch #1034), The Washington Institute, September 8, 2005; "The Endurance of Yemen's Al Qaeda Franchise," STRATFOR, November 2, 2010; and Camille Tawil, "How Bin Ladin's Death Will Affect Al-Qa'ida's Regional Franchises," Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, May 1, 2011.

―Just as you can buy the franchise for, say, a Holiday Inn or an Intercontinental hotel, so you can adopt the principles of Osama bin Laden and set up your own deadly group, murdering those you identify as the enemies of the faith - and anyone else, of course, who happens to be passing at the time."[25] This categorization suggests that the violent Islamist movement operates along hierarchical lines; al-Qaida sits alone at the top of the structure and functions like a _home office' that sets grand-strategy, while regional groups function like _independently owned outlets' that follow al-Qaida's dictates in exchange for immediate brand recognition, which enables the franchise to reap greater rewards than it would by operating an almost identical organization under its own distinct name. However, the self-organizing jihadists debated by Hoffman and Sageman completely escaped this typology.

Other scholars reconciled this omission by presenting three-tiered amalgamations of the Hoffman-Sageman characterization and the franchise model. For example, in 2010, Martha Crenshaw argued that the contemporary Islamist terror movement consists of: (1) a core group of leaders that ―provides ideological direction and guidance as well as some resources (mainly assistance with training and funding)," (2) a second-tier leadership consisting of ―affiliated or merged local organizations with their own interests in specific conflict zones"—groups analogous to Gardner's franchises—and members of the organization who serve as ―local leaders in Western countries," and (3) the sort of self-organizing jihadists that most-worried Sageman.[26] Ultimately, she sought to explain that Islamist terrorism is simultaneously organized from the ―top down" and the ―bottom up."

Scott Helfstein and Dominic Wright, a pair of researchers at West Point's Combating Terrorism Center, attempted to recast Crenshaw's theory in more formal terms.[27] Their effort centered on distinguishing between her three levels based on the strength of ties. They re-appropriated terminology that sociologist Mark Granovetter first put forth in the 1970s to explain the important role that casual, weakly-tied acquaintances play in employment searches by expanding job-seekers' awareness of open positions beyond the few jobs about which seekers' close associates, who share a common pool of knowledge and frame of reference, have information.[28] According to Helfstein and Wright's revision of Crenshaw, Islamists with strong ties to al-Qaida's leaders, most especially Usama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri, comprise al-Qaida's core. Islamists with weak ties to members of the core comprise al-Qaida's periphery, a broad category that includes members of local organizations like Somalia's al-Shabab and AQAP. Finally, violent Islamists who operate absent ties to al-Qaida are merely motivated by "Al Qaeda ideals of transnational jihad" and offer examples of self-organizing terrorism.[29] To restate Helfstein and Wright's typology in the simplest terms, the Islamist terror movement is a core-periphery-isolate structure with al-Qaida at its center.

However, theirs is not the only effort to reconcile the franchise model and the Hoffman-Sageman characterization. European researchers Javier Jordán, Fernando Mañas, and Nicola Horsburgh independently developed a competing, but similar, tripartite categorization. According to their vocabulary, the violent Islamist movement contains:

According to the authors' own characterization of their work, Helfstein and Wright's typology draws heavily on a characterization of al-Qaida that Martha Crenshaw offered during Congressional testimony. She then restated her views in a piece written for West Point's Combatting Terrorism Center: Martha Crenshaw, "Assessing the Al-Qa'ida Threat to the United States," CTC Sentinel, January 13, 2010; available online: http://www.ctc.usma.edu/posts/assessing-the-al-qaida-threat-to-the-united-states.

2. Local cells, which are led by members of al-Qaida or related groups, but which also contain many individuals who lack membership in ―the mother organization."[31] In other words, individuals with indirect, weak ties to the core.

3. Full-fledged members of GJMV groups, including operational commanders and members of ―hit squads," which benefit from the organization's full logistical support and are deployed to conduct a specific attack, as best illustrated by ―the pilots and hijackers of 9/11."[32] Given that ―ordering hits" seems to constitute a strong interaction, the individuals contained in this category would qualify as part of al-Qaida's core as described by Helfstein and Wright.

But why stop at three categories? Bale drew heavily on the work of Jordán and his co-authors as the basis for a five-tiered system that describes the nature of European terror groups' ties to al-Qaida. He argued that there are (1) ―hit teams" deployed to the West to conduct specific operations, (2) local cells with long-term objectives that were deliberately planted in the West by their parent organizations and which continue to receive periodic support from the parent organization, (3) local Western jihadist cells that formerly held close ties to foreign terror groups, but which re-formed independently without outside influence, (4) self-generating grassroots groups that hold direct or indirect connections to established terror groups or to other independent grassroots groups, and (5) self-generating grassroots groups that lack demonstrable connections to other components of the broader jihadist movement.[33] Yet, because Europe is Bale's explicit focus, there is an implicit sixth category: the South Asian, South East Asian, Middle Eastern, and North African terror groups to which European cells are (or are not) connected.

While several of these typologies are sophisticated, they all suffer from the same failing: none have been broadly implemented. For all of their bickering about the relative dangers of self-organizing terrorism and formal jihadist groups, neither Hoffman nor Sageman ever formally estimate the frequency of either pattern. They were more concerned with stating which pattern is more potentially lethal than which pattern is more common. Simpson and Crenshaw discussed their typologies in purely theoretical terms and offered no supporting cases. Jordan, et al, and Bale discussed individual cases in the context of theory building, but their goal was to demonstrate that various categories exist in the real world, rather than to assess their prevalence. Helfstein and Wright offered the broadest take and considered two dozen incidents, but given that government bean-counters claim that Sunni Islamists have conducted upwards of 25,000 terrorist attacks, the West Point researchers' sample does not seem particularly representative.[34]

Why are narrow implementations problematic? The answer is, perhaps, best illustrated with a simple example drawn from outside terrorism. Consider a typology of human physiology that classifies people based on the number of limbs they possess. Owing to amputations and genetic abnormalities, the typology would need to include all values between zero and eight (in 2005, an eight-limbed girl was born in India, where she was worshipped as a reincarnated Hindu deity).[35] However, wide implementation of the typology would reveal that the vast majority of people fall into the four-limbed category. Most of the possible values represent aberrant cases that, while interesting, do not accurately represent common patterns in human physiology.

To extend the metaphor, terrorism researchers run an extreme risk of studying quadruple amputees and eight-legged babies when they use single cases to explore the theoretical boundaries of jihadist terrorism. It simply is not clear that the findings of such studies are generalizable to the broader phenomenon. If cases hopes to represent general trends, or even they hope to highlight behavior that is unique but meaningful, then logic dictates that a broad empirical effort at categorization must precede case-based analyses, because it is impossible to determine how representative or unique a case may be without first examining the frequency of possible outcomes. Typology building done for its own sake is ultimately of questionable intellectual value, because broad-based testing is necessary to demonstrate that theoretical categorizations accurately characterize real-world outcomes.[36]

1.2 PRACTICAL BARRIERS FACED BY BROAD-BASED STUDIES OF JIHADIST TERRORISM

Unfortunately, a number of obstacles complicate the seemingly simple process of conducting this sort of badly needed empirical work, and data is first among them. As Helfstein and Wright correctly note, none of the currently available databases include comprehensive information on both successful terror attacks and failed plots.[37] Indeed, the Global Terrorism Database (GTD) maintained by the National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and [36] This opinion is essentially a restatement of the oft-stated conclusion that research should move from the exploratory, to the descriptive, to the explanatory. For a succinct discussion of this intellectual progression, see: Colin Robson, Real World Research, (Oxford: Blackwell, 1993), pp. 41-42. For a more thorough discussion on the pitfalls of inquiries that proceed despite significant bias in their case selection, see Gary King, Robert O. Keohane, and Sidney Verba, Designing Social Inquiry: Scientific Inference in Qualitative Research, (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994), pp. 128-137. Responses to Terrorism (START), the Worldwide Incident Tracking System (WITS) maintained by the United States National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC), and the RAND Database of Worldwide Terrorism Incidents (RDWTI) all explicitly exclude plots that were foiled early-on, as well as plots that terrorists aborted of their own volition.[38] Thus, despite their impressive size, these resources greatly truncate the phenomenon of terrorism, and these databases are arguably the most complete sources of quantitative data available to researchers. Less comprehensive resources contain even greater omissions.

Moreover, these "big three" are of scant utility for analyzing terrorism at the organizational level, because WITS categorizes perpetrators only by broad type (e.g., "Secular/Political/Anarchist," "Islamic Extremist (Sunni)," and "Christian Extremist"), while the GTD and the RDWTI both use vague processes of attribution that are non-replicable and fraught with flaws. Specifically, in order to determine organizations' involvement in attacks, the GTD and the RDWTI use nearly identical methodologies that rely heavily on terror groups' own claims of responsibility. Regional and topical experts have the opportunity to object to these classifications, but they then impose entirely subjective assessments that fail to estimate the scale of organizations' involvement.

Consider the 2002 Bali bombings as an example that highlights the shortcomings of this approach. Both the GTD and the RDWTI state that al-Qaida claimed the attack and that members of Jemmah Islamiyyah (JI) were known or suspected to have participated in the bombing, but neither database stipulates how large a role the respective organizations played.[39] Without additional information, the roles of al-Qaida and JI seem equivalent—a finding disputed by several reputable analysts who have studied the Bali attacks.[40] Assessments of organizational involvement in terrorist events must estimate the extent of responsibility in order to provide true analytic value.

However, the ambiguities inherent to these databases extend well beyond these sorts of scaling issues; the vague processes used to determine organizational involvement in attacks can attribute responsibility to groups that may exist in name only. For example, numerous analysts—including those at START, the organization that maintains the GTD—question whether or not the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades (AHMB) actually exist, because the group has claimed high-profile attacks on three continents, as well as a U.S. power black-out that has been definitively disproven as an incident of terror.[41] Yet the GTD and the RDWTI both attribute responsibility for the 2004 Madrid attacks to the organization based solely on a single AHMB spokesman's claim of responsibility.[42] Thus, it is unwise to trust the existing databases'

GTD actually attributes 11 incidents to the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades, but six of them took place on March 3, 2004 in Spain and are typically referenced by scholars as a single incident, namely the 2004 Madrid attacks, and another four of the 11 attacks took place in London on July 7, 2005 and are also typically referenced as a single incident, namely the 2005 London bombings or, alternately, the 7/7 attacks. This level of abstraction issue is not mentioned as a criticism in the body of the review, because to date no one has offered a reasonable solution. Questions regarding when to consider a string of bombings as a single characterization of organizational involvement in attacks at face value, because many claims of responsibility are unreliable.

The impact of these failings is clear: much of the empirical literature on terrorism is falsely definitive because researchers implement these databases without fully considering their shortcomings. Ogen Goldman's effort to estimate the extent of terrorism's globalization offers a useful illustration. His study is theoretically sound; it attempted to gauge the accuracy of assertions that policy makers and the media frequently make regarding the increasingly transnational character of terrorism. The broad strokes of Goldman's methodological approach are similarly sound; he attempted to determine the share of terrorism that groups conduct outside of their _home turf' and then compared the results over time in order to highlight longitudinal trends. Using rigorous statistical methods, he found that terrorism has become decreasingly transnational. Therefore, at first blush, Goldman seemed debunk beliefs held by policy makers and the media, and seemed to put-to-bed the need for additional inquiries into the geographic scope of terror operations.

However, in reality, the inherent flaws of the existing databases, specifically the RDWTI, trickled-down to undermine an otherwise well-conceived and well-executed analysis. The database's sole emphasis on attacks dictated that Goldman likely truncated terrorism's transnational variance by ignoring incomplete plots, and because the data examined events only at the organizational level, Goldman was incapable of analyzing the sort of transnational interactions that occurred at the individual level when Indonesians traveled to Afghanistan to receive training, before conducting attacks back home. Moreover, the data's inclusion of ambiguous organizations like the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades may undermine Goldman's study entirely, because it remains to be seen how an organization that does not exist can have ‗home turf.' In addition to demonstrating that even basic questions regarding the geography of terrorism remain unanswered, this critique shows that inquiries based on typical approaches to quantitative data are just as incapable of accurately characterizing the breadth of terrorism as are the small-N qualitative approaches associated with the construction of unpopulated typologies.

A number of scholars have attempted to overcome such problems by constructing original datasets that focus on terrorists at the individual level. Unfortunately, these efforts fell victim to many of the same shortcomings as the preceding approaches. Several scholars have created datasets that examine the relationships that exist between the individuals involved in a single event or organization.[43] In theory, such inquiries enable analysts to characterize actors' structural role in a single event or organization, but it is rarely clear how the authors have bounded the inquiry, because they fail to specify how distant individuals must be from an event or organization before they cease to be included in the data. Moreover, as Bale highlights by postulating that the individual with the greatest number of contacts (highest degree centrality) may be an errand boy tasked with taking food orders from the cell's more important members, this approach sometimes conflates formal measures of centrality with importance.[44] And even when well-constructed, quantitative data collected at the individual level cannot, in and of itself, enable an inquiry to draw inferences regarding the broader phenomenon under study. Formal, structural analyses of individual terror events and groups are nothing more than quantified single-case case studies and consequently face all of the same generalizability issues associated with small-N qualitative approaches.

Broader datasets are fairly rare, but suffer from the same classification issues that undermine the GTD and the RWDTI. The John Jay and ARTIS Transnational Terrorism (JJATT) Database,[45] which constitutes a limited public release of the data that Marc Sageman used to generate his controversial "leaderless" characterization of the Islamist terror movement,[46] and the terrorism resources maintained by the Center for Computational Analysis of Social and Organizational Systems (CASOS) at Carnegie Mellon University offer examples.[47] Within the JJATT data, individuals' group affiliation is "self-declared or assigned by (an) expert," but the codebook fails to mention what criteria are used to determine the veracity of the individuals' membership claims or the process that experts use to assess membership.[48] Thus, the process is vague, non-replicable, and may fall victim to deception by individuals who wish to exaggerate their ties to prominent jihadist groups. Given that slight shifts in the boundaries of terror groups can greatly affect how 'leaderless' various operational cells appear to be, it is also worth questioning the role that coders' pre-existing biases about the breadth of al-Qaida may have played in determining Sageman's conclusions. If the individuals who coded the JJATT data started the project believing that ‗leaderless' cells were prevalent, then their subjective assessments of al-Qaida's membership may have been overly conservative and may have greatly contributed to Sageman's ultimate finding. Put most simply, overly subjective membership assessments can create self-fulfilling prophecies.

The CASOS data is slightly more explicit about its approach, yet fails to adequately address the issue of subjective coding. The CASOS data determines individuals' organizational affiliations based on media portrayals: if a news source states that someone is a member of a group, then the CASOS data accepts this assessment at face value.[49] However, this approach constitutes little more than an end-run around classification ambiguities; it places responsibility for determining individuals' group affiliations with journalists, who never specify how they classify terrorists. Ultimately, neither dataset provides well-reasoned judgments regarding membership in terrorist organizations.

Moreover, the JJATT and CASOS datasets fail to adequately address the completion issues raised by the big-three databases' exclusive focus on completed events. Although the JJATT data focuses on several failed plots, it includes only 92 total events, and many of these cases are drawn from ‗traditional' political terrorism, rather than the world of violent Islamist extremism.[50] It is also unclear how and why the authors of the JJATT data selected these events instead of others, so, to revive the physiology metaphor, the data's authors may have simply collected all of the eight-limbed babies into a single nursery. It is unclear how well the JJATT sample represents Islamist terrorism as a phenomenon.

Finally, the public version of the data is exceptionally opaque. For reasons that remain unclear, the authors anonymized the information; the individuals included in the data are listed only by identification number, not by name, making it impossible to independently verify the data's accuracy or completeness, much less to replicate the author's coding decisions. It is, for example, impossible to use the data to create a list of events involving Usama bin Laden, and it is impossible to determine how the authors characterized relationships among the various participants in the 9/11 attacks.

JJATT's opacity also takes a second form; although Sageman's published work claims that his data made wide use of news articles and court documents,[51] none of the available literature specifies the scope and composition of the sources used to construct the JJATT data. The number of sources that the data contains and the frequency with which it cites different types of sources remain unclear. Although Sageman persistently claims to practice "science" in the study of terrorism,[52] anyone who uses his data must trust on faith that it reliably characterizes the Islamist terror movement.

Because the analysts at CASOS specify that their data drew on 202 media articles collected from Lexis-Nexis Academic, 45 documents drawn from "non-classified trial transcripts, excerpts from books, scientific articles, and texts from web pages,"[53] as well as numerous government sanctioning lists,[54] their dataset offers an alternative to the JJATT data that is comparable in size and largely avoids issues of source opacity.[55] However, the CASOS data has other unique characteristics that may make the dataset better suited to the study of pure network theory than to rigorous explorations of the nature of the Islamist terrorism.

In order to code the data, CASOS relied on AutoMap, a semi-automated text analysis program that determines the existence of relationships based on terms' proximity to each other in printed text.[56] The limitations created by this reliance on technology are best demonstrated by considering the manner in which AutoMap would process a simple declarative sentence:

"The United States lacks diplomatic relationships with Bhutan, Iran, and Cuba, but maintains close ties with Canada and Mexico."

An intuitive reading of the sentence reveals only two ties: one between the US and Canada, the other between the US and Mexico. By contrast, the number of relationships that AutoMap would find depends on a user-controlled variable known as "window size," which sets the maximum distance that can exist between related terms. At a window size of two, the term "United States" would be linked to the words "lacks" and "diplomatic." At a window size of five, "United States" would be linked to with "lacks," "diplomatic," "relationships," "with," and "Bhutan." In order to reach Canada and Mexico, the only two countries that the sentence specifies as American diplomatic partners, the window size would need to be set equal to the number of words included in the sentence—a coding scheme that would also cause AutoMap to find relationships between the US and the three countries it does not recognize, as well as

[55] The available literature does not list the number of events the CASOS dataset contains. Instead, the data is characterized in terms of agents and organizations and data on 3,029 individuals and 1,635 organizations. As JJATT data is characterized in terms of both events and agents/organizations, a size comparison is still possible. JJATT includes information on 2,158 individuals and approximately 1367 organizations. For a characterization of the CASOS data, see: Luke M. Gerdes and Kathleen Carley, "Learning What We Don't Know: An Estimation of the Accuracy of Media Sources Used in Network Analyses of Terror," Paper Presented to the 29th Annual International Sunbelt Social Network Conference of the International Network for Social Network Analysis (INSNA), San Diego, CA, 2009. relationships that the sentence does not describe among Bhutan, Iran, Cuba, Canada, and Mexico. There is no scientific means to determine an ‗accurate' window size; users must base their decision on experience or trial-and-error. Consequently, AutoMap's results are not deterministic; a number of different networks could be obtained from identical texts.[57]

Moreover, in order to obtain good results, users must provide the program with a substantial amount of additional information. At a minimum, AutoMap requires comprehensive delete lists (to remove superfluous terms like "and" or "the"), extensive thesauri (to allow the program to recognize equivalent terms and alternative spellings as the same concept), and attribute lists (to allow the program to associate terms like "United States" with a class of actors like "Countries").[58] Broad inquiries, especially those that take place in the ambiguity-ridden field of terrorism, are unlikely to have all of this necessary information at the outset of a study, and AutoMap's accuracy will decline accordingly, regardless of the window size used in coding. Ultimately, the program represents a substantial contribution to the bodies of work that address coding processes and semantic analysis, but AutoMap's information requirements and susceptibility to false positives makes its results less than ideal for the study empirical relationships.

1.3 THE MODIFIED SNOWBALL PROCESS FOR DATA COLLECTION

Clearly, it is necessary to create an original, hand-coded dataset of substantial size in order to study the breadth of the Islamist terror movement, but even this effort is doomed to imperfection. As the NCTC analysts who compile WITS make clear, Islamist terrorism is poorly bounded and distinguishing it from related forms phenomena like insurgency and crime –can be more art than science."[59] Gaps in information are also unavoidable, and judgments regarding both the nature of events and the perpetrators involved frequently change over time. Consequently, substantial ambiguity is inherent to the subject matter and it is impossible for any terror dataset to provide truly comprehensive coverage.[60]

While they cannot eliminate these problems, structured data-collection efforts are necessary to mitigate these issues to the greatest extent possible. Anthropological methods used in the study of hard-to-reach populations like drug addicts and prostitutes offer a reasonable starting place because these research approaches have a proven track-record on subjects that rival terrorism in terms of inherent clandestineness and ambiguity. Specifically, the snowball sampling method, which earned its name from the image of a snowball gathering size and speed as it rolls downhill, offers a compelling logic that compliments the emphasis on person-to-person relationships that is part-and-parcel of studying terrorism at the individual level.

In traditional implementations of snowballing, researchers begin by interviewing a small handful of subjects who exist within the target population. These initial subjects then provide additional names of other members of the target population, who in turn provide more names. This process continues iteratively, until the researcher either obtains a statistically significant sample size or, more frequently, hits a wall and cannot obtain any new names. Thus, the method's underlying assumption is that members of a community, whether comprised of heroin addicts or astrophysicists, know each other. [61]

Unfortunately, characteristics of Islamist terrorism complicate snowball sampling's implementation in a traditional, interview-based format. Although Horgan argues rather convincingly that researchers can (and should) conduct first-hand interviews with active terrorists, all of the examples that he uses to support his argument are drawn from traditional political terrorism.[62] Violent Islamists' treatment of journalists elucidates that religious terrorists often view impartial interviewers as legitimate targets. For example, while seeking an interview with a radical cleric in Pakistan, the Wall Street Journal's Daniel Pearl was kidnapped and beheaded by Islamist militants in 2003. Similarly, in 2008, members of the Haqqani network in Afghanistan abducted British journalist David Rohde,[63] and in the southern Philippines, the Abu Sayyaf Group has kidnapped journalists on at least three separate occasions since 2000.[64] Though Rohde and the Abu Sayyaf victims were eventually returned to safety, it seems clear that efforts to interview active jihadists are inherently dangerous. Former jihadists, who left radical organizations of their own volition, and imprisoned jihadists, whose potential for harm is greatly mitigated by their incarceration, may serve as strong sources of information on the violent Islamist movement, and, indeed, Horgan has relied heavily on interviews with these populations when researching radical Islam instead of political terror, but ex-terrorists and prisoners are exceptionally difficult to access.[65] In combination, these factors dictate that traditional implementations of snowball sampling are less than ideally suited to provide broad coverage of the Islamist movement, though the method remains capable of providing detailed insight into small pockets of the phenomenon, particularly its less violent portions.

Therefore, this study adopted snowball sampling's logic, but implemented it in relation to the types of media, court, and government sources used in the construction of preceding datasets that study terrorism at the individual level, such as those produced by JJATT and CASOS. For example, the study's inquiry into the 2004 bombings of trains near Atocha Station in Madrid began with a single name: Jamal Zougam, a Moroccan convicted for his involvement in the bombing. A Lexis-Nexis search conducted on Zougam's name produced news articles that discussed a number of additional people, including the Madrid-based Islamic cleric Abu Dahdah and several others known or suspected of involvement in the Madrid attacks, such as Jamal Ahmidan, Serhane ben Abdelmajid Fakhet, and Abdennabi Kounjaa. Each of these new names served as an additional search term, which in turn resulted in more new names. The process was repeated with each successive wave of search terms, until the study either hit a dead end, where additional searches returned no relevant new names, or the study veered too far from the subject of attacks on civilians. When the process provided information on people involved in insurgencies, such as those in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Chechnya, the study recorded the data, but did not use the criminals or insurgents as new search terms. For the visually minded, Figure 1.1 provides a graphic representation of the process.

However, because this study seeks to examine overall changes in al-Qaida's connection to jihadist attacks, a single starting point would be inappropriate. Instead, the study began with a dozen major completed attacks that occurred between 1998, when al-Qaida first debuted on the international security agenda with the bombing of United States embassies in East Africa, and the end of 2008. The study then worked each attack as an expanding snowball sample, in order to see how these attacks connected to each other, as well as to smaller, lesser-known attacks and failed plots.

Issues of journalistic accuracy dictate that it is just as important to include a diversity of source types as it is to begin from multiple starting points. Specifically, Maier's research on media accuracy suggests that between 41 and 60 percent of newspaper articles contain some sort of factual mistake.[66] Therefore, although the breadth of coverage offered from media databases is truly impressive—Lexis-Nexis alone boasts more than five billion individual documents obtained from some 40,000 sources[67]— the snowball process attempted to mitigate the data ambiguity inherent to media sources by extending the pool of sources to include relevant court documents, available police reports, declassified and unclassified reports issued by federal agencies, relevant reports from international organizations like Interpol, and reports from select non-governmental organizations like the International Crisis Group. Additional streams of information were derived from site visits, which were conducted in more than a dozen countries, and interviews, which were conducted in a semi-structured format with 16 subjects drawn from the policy community, foreign law enforcement, foreign intelligence services, foreign court officials involved in terrorism trials, foreign academics involved in the study of terrorism, technical experts, and one reformed terrorist.[68] Although the academic literature on terrorism serves as a bountiful, perhaps even bloated, source of theory, the snowball process excluded academic journals as a source of data because their inclusion would introduce substantial entropy, by trusting that previous scholars faithfully and impartially reproduced data included [68] The site visits and interviews were conducted between June and August of 2010 with support from the Smith Richardson World Politics and Statecraft Fellowship. Nations visited included the United Kingdom, Spain, Morocco, Kenya, Tanzania, India, Singapore, Indonesia, and the Philippines. Initially, prospective interview subjects were approached via email, and additional subjects were then obtained via snowball sampling. However, response rates for interview requests were fairly low, in the neighborhood of 20 percent. In total, 21 interviews were conducted, but six of the subjects self-identified as possessing no useful knowledge on the topic of the interview, and their responses were consequently disregarded, leaving a final sample of 16 interviews. These low numbers dictate that the sample was non-representative and should ultimately be viewed as an opportunity sample. In terms of process, the interviews were conducted in English, which was a second language for 5 of the 16 interview subjects. In accordance with IRB protocols regarding the protection of subjects' right to privacy, subjects were allowed the opportunity to participate anonymously if they so desired, and 11 of the 16 subjects chose to remain un-named confidential informants. Similarly, interview subjects were allowed the opportunity to decline audio recording of the interview; 7 of the interview subjects availed themselves of this option. These subjects' responses were recorded as detailed notes, while the responses of the 9 remaining subjects were audio-recorded and then transcribed. Given that the interview subjects had expertise on specific events and issues, the survey instrument varied accordingly. One example can be found in Appendix B.

from their often un-cited sources,[69] and also because journals' inclusion in the data would run the severe risk of conflating authors' interpretive conclusions with accepted fact, a particularly pernicious problem given the wide diversity of views that exist on terrorism even among reputable scholars.[70]

This criticism of the academic literature should not imply that the primary documents listed above are free from flaws. Indeed, each category of sources contains its own inherent deficiencies and biases,[71] so data was triangulated from multiple independent sources whenever possible, but despite this effort it remains unclear how great the corrective effects of the primary documents were. Ultimately, all document-based research on terrorism, whether qualitative or quantitative in approach, suffers from an inescapable and unsolvable problem: it is never entirely clear if the patterns evident in the data stem from meaningful changes in the organizations under study, or if the patterns existed all along and were merely revealed because journalists, the courts, government analysts, and police began to devote additional attention to the organizations in question.

In an effort to avoid the source opacity that characterizes the JJATT data, figure 1.2 summarizes the relative frequency of the various types of sources included in the sample of roughly 3,200 documents yielded by the snowball sample. Media sources constitute the vast majority (81 percent) of the sources cited in the data, but as figure 1.3 demonstrates, news sources account for less than half (46 percent) of the nearly 24,000 individual citations that constitute the main body of the dataset.[72] Though far fewer in number, each primary document was a comparatively rich source of data that yielded more citations than the far more numerous media articles.

[72] Many individual citations contain multiple sources. If they were of different types (e.g. one source was a court document and the other was a news article), the benefit of the doubt went to the primary document, as it became clear during the course of coding some 24,000 interactions that the primary documents were invariably ‗closer' to the event they attempted to portray. Indeed, as it concerns court documents, the new coverage of a given event is often a second or third person recounting of evidence presented at trial. This conclusion raises questions regarding entropy within news sources that are beyond the scope of this inquiry, but which must ultimately be answered if terrorism scholars wish to produce truly objective datasets.

While valuable, purely quantitative descriptions of the sources likely fall short in their efforts to elucidate the potential extent of source biases. Not all interactions included in the data are of equal analytic value, so quantitative descriptions at least partially conflating the quantity of data provided by various types of sources with that data's importance. Interactions that contain strong evidence of surprising, novel, and/or vital connections among violent Islamists are inherently more analytically valuable than interactions which merely strengthen or extend an already robust relationship that has existed for years. Anecdotal experience suggests that, with the exception of a handful of penetrating pieces of investigative journalism, domestic American news sources and news wires tended to yield the largest share of _routine' information, while foreign media publications provided the greatest number of surprises—a conclusion that may say as much about these sources' reliability as their attention to local stories ignored by western news outlets writing for audiences thousands of miles removed from the event. Finally, primary documents provide the greatest level of detail, but the quantity of minute interactions that court documents contain can sometimes be so great as to be almost crippling. However, it is impossible to confirm these assessments, as no two analysts are likely to be in complete agreement regarding which pieces of data are important or surprising, and few people are likely to be willing to wade through more than 24,000 interactions to make such judgments. Thus, the potential impact that sources biases may have on any conclusions stemming from the data remains an open and ultimately unanswerable question.

Beyond ensuring coverage of a wide swath of sources, the primary benefit of the modified snowball process was to ensure that individuals received as even a research treatment as the underlying source material allows. As Malcolm Sparrow illustrated in his assessment of the implementation of network analysis in the field of criminal intelligence, investigators often create false patterns of individual centrality by focusing collection efforts on the people that they find most interesting, or the people that they suspect are the most important at the outset of the inquiry.[73] Consequently, purely intuitive collection efforts, as epitomized by many studies that utilize Analyst's Notebook, Palantir, and other visually-driven collection interfaces, run the severe risk of creating self-fulfilling prophecies that merely quantify the investigator's pre-existing biases by attributing quantitative scores of importance to actors who merely received a disproportionate share of the investigator's attention. When strictly implemented, the modified snowball process's iterative use of search terms ameliorates such tendencies by forcing researchers to devote equal attention to the fascinating and the mundane.

[73] Malcolm K. Sparrow, "The application of network analysis to criminal intelligence: An assessment of the process," Social Networks, Vol. 13 (1991), pp. 251-274.

However, the process mitigates only the collector's bias and does not address similar underlying issues in the source material itself. Because sources are inconsistent in the amount of detail they provide on individuals involved in terrorism, the data may still falsely attribute importance to the most discussed actors. Therefore, despite the breadth of the data's coverage, it is only questionably suited to answering questions of individual centrality (i.e., "who played the key logistical role in the Madrid bombings?") and is better suited to the study of general patterns that are not as heavily affected by unavoidable data omissions.

The standard rebuttal to such concerns draws on a slight misinterpretation of methodological research into the robustness of formal measures of centrality. For example, Carlo Morselli justified his use of formal centrality scores in "the identification of various types of key participants" in clandestine networks on the grounds that such measures "have proven to robust measures in view of missing data problems."[74] To support his assertion, he cited detailed empirical analyses of robustness conducted by a trio of methodological heavyweights, namely Steve Borgatti, Kathleen Carley, and David Krackhardt. However, Morselli over-generalized the results of their analysis.

Borgatti, et al, found that formal measures of centrality are robust in the face of random data errors in random networks.[75] Neither this analysis nor subsequent work has addressed the analytic impact of non-random omissions and errors, such as those that occur because sources bias coverage in the favor of individuals that police investigators or journalists find most interesting. Similarly, Carley's more recent work, conducted in partnership with Terrill Frantz and Marcelo Cataldo, found that a network's overall shape (topology) had a profound impact on the sensitivity of centrality measures to missing data,[76] thereby indicating that claims of data robustness do not extend to the sort of non-random, functionally-organized clandestine networks that Morselli described. Finally, Morselli's own characterization of clandestine networks as lacking density (i.e., having low ratios between the actual ties in the network to the number of ties that would exist if all actors were tied to each other),[77] suggests that analyses of individual importance in "dark networks" may be problematic, because additional inquiries into the robustness of formal centrality measures found that such characterizations are least reliable in sparse networks.[78]

[75] Stephen P. Borgatti, Kathleen M. Carley, and David Krackhardt, "On the robustness of centrality measures under conditions of imperfect data," Social Networks, Vol. 28 (2006), pp. 124-136.

However, the analytic limits imposed by issues of source bias are not unique to Morselli's work, and, as his inquiry made extensive use of recorded telephone intercepts and other pools of detailed data not typically available to the public, these issues are less likely to be profound in his analysis than in work which draw on smaller pools of less reliable data, such as Valdis Krebs' widely-publicized (but questionably conducted) attempt to formally characterize relationships among the 9/11 hijackers using only press accounts published in the first six weeks after the 2001 attacks.[79] Nor are the source limitations discussed in regards to Morselli's work inherent only to quantitative analyses; indeed, they be even more problematic in qualitative assessments, where according to the pioneering philosopher of science Karl Popper, "uncritical" researchers have complete freedom to cherry-pick sources — to obtain what appears to be overwhelming evidence in favor of a theory which, if approached critically, would have been refuted."[80] Therefore, this process-oriented discussion of sources on terrorism ends where it began, with a disclaimer regarding the opacity inherent to clandestine topics:

Regardless of the process used to compile data, efforts to study terrorism at the individual-level will remain mired in a substantial amount of unavoidable ambiguity. The modified snowball process minimizes these issues; it does not eliminate them.

1.4 THE PERSPECTIVE OF DYNAMIC NETWORK ANALYSIS

While the roughly 24,000 interactions summarized above begin to hint at the size of the dataset that resulted from the modified snowball process, this description does not adequately describe the breadth of the data's coverage, because the figures provide no information on whom or what the data describes. A brief discussion of analytic methodology must necessarily precede such a summary, because methods are exceptionally uneven in their treatment of data, and different methods mandate different data collection criteria. Because network analysis is best understood as the formal quantitative study of the relationships that exist between entities,[81] this methodological perspective dovetails nicely with the emphasis on person-to-person interactions that is inherent to the modified snowball. Moreover, network analysis has the ability to provide the sort of continuous data necessary to accurately classify al-Qaida's involvement in Islamist terrorism. To be blunt: network analysis is well-suited to this analysis.

However, data criteria vary greatly between different types of network analysis. Social Network Analysis (SNA) is the most familiar member of this family of methods, and in its simplest incarnation, examines relationships within a single class of entities, such as individual people, small groups, large organizations, websites, nation states, or even ideas. In the jargon of the discipline, such networks are called one-mode networks because they contain data about only a single type of actor. The most accessible example is of interactions among a small group of people;[82] the binary data matrix and the graph below, which contain equivalent data, illustrate how simple network analysis begins to quantify the study of relationships and begins to demonstrate the method's collection requirements.

But the complexity of the real world is far greater than that suggested by small, flat networks. Actors share connections not only with other actors, but also with events, organizations, beliefs, and knowledge, to name only a few items. Some social network analyses consider two-mode data, for example by examining actors' interaction with events, but this perspective struggles to accommodate a wider complement of interactions. Moreover, SNA often ignores the diversity of relationships and codes all interactions as identical, despite the obvious qualitative differences between, for example, family bonds and business interactions.[83] Some prominent studies, such as Krackhardt's work on the differences between advice networks and friendship networks inside entrepreneurial firms,[84] adopt a multi-relational perspective, but these efforts are the exception, not the rule, and even these studies typically confine themselves to no more than three classes of relationships. The vast majority of studies also tend to focus on small organizations, thereby ensuring near-perfect information, and typically consider only one point in time.[85] Ultimately, these factors dictate that SNA is less than ideally suited to the study of large, ambiguity-ridden, evolutionary phenomena like terrorism.

Enter Dynamic Network Analysis (DNA). This perspective comes closer to approximating the real world by explicitly considering large networks filled with multiple node classes. The method and its tools are flexible—they accommodate virtually any ontology the user can create—but, as Carley argues, people, organizations, events, knowledge, resources, roles, and locations are particularly relevant to the study of terrorism, because this array of node classes facilitates the analysis of a broad range of human, technological, and geographical interdependencies.[86] Moreover, DNA does not present a single "flat" network; instead, the [86] This assessment is an extension of Krackhardt and Carley's work on the PCANS framework, which stressed Precedence, Commitment of resources, Assignment of individuals to tasks, Networks of relations among personnel, and Skills linking individuals to resources. Carley rebranded the framework along similar lines in her 2002 and 2003 publications, and the emphasis on geography stems from recent advancements in DNA tools, which now allow for the geospatial display of data. method represents interactions as a sequence of networks over time, which allows DNA to explore and formally model adaptation, which occurs as ―the set of networks linking people, knowledge, tasks, and other groups or organizations co-evolve."[87] In short, this study adopted DNA because the method's explicit emphasis on large networks and complexity makes it better suited to the study of terrorism than SNA.

The node classes described by Carley served as the basis for the scheme used to code the data collected via the modified snowball process, but additional attribute data was collected to enable the analysis to sub-divide the classes by type. Therefore, the breadth of the data can be described by summarizing the quantity of actors that fell into some of the larger sub-categories, though gluttons for punishment can indulge their desire to examine the details of the data by reviewing Appendixes C through F, which contain various types of attribute information on agents and events included in the snowball sample, and Appendix H, a data file that recounts each individual interaction, the evidence that supports the classification of each interaction, and the relevant sources for each interaction. Less masochistic readers can obtain an appreciation for the breadth of the data by examining Figures 1.5, which categorizes the people, relevant events, and non-terrorist organizations listed in the data. For reasons outlined in detail in the second chapter, it would be inappropriate to list the number of jihadist organizations as contained in the raw data.

1.5 BEYOND THE SNOWBALL: SITUATING A CONTINUOUS ESTIMATION OF AL-QAIDA'S INVOLVMENT IN TERRORISM WITHIN THE EXISTING THEORETICAL LITERATURE

Merely building a broad-based sample of individuals involved in Islamist terrorism is not sufficient to ensure meaningful results. Because there are an infinite number of ways to interpret data, theory also plays a necessary role. Helfstein and Wright's attempt to determine operational differences among three levels of al-Qaida (the core, the periphery, and isolates) provides a useful starting point to discuss the role of theory in broad-based inquiries, because although this study includes only two dozen events drawn from the somewhat problematic JJATT data, it represents one of the broadest attempts to implement a classification system that categorizes relationships within the Islamist terror movement. Their work begins to highlight definitional ambiguities that problematize most inquiries into terrorism.

Helfstein and Wright's classification scheme hinges on differentiating between "strong," "weak," and "absent" ties to the highest echelons of al-Qaida's leadership, but they neglect to provide explicit definitions of these terms. They define cells with strong ties as those that are "tightly associated with Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri," while cells with weak ties "loosely associate with Al Qaeda senior leadership."[1] However, such statements are of questionable utility because they akin to defining a "tall man" as someone who is "long-legged."

To their credit, Helfstein and Wright provide some examples to help conceptualize the differences between categories: the 9/11 hijackers have strong ties to al-Qaida, and the perpetrators of the 1995 Riyadh bombing, who purportedly trained in a bin Laden-funded camp, have weak ties to al-Qaida. But ultimately the authors ultimately describe their terms, rather than defining them. Without an explicit discussion of thresholds between categories, the authors' terms are ambiguous at best.

[1] Helfstein and Wright, p. 369.

An examination of the JJATT data that underlies Helfstein and Wright's inquiry does little to resolve the ambiguity. According to the JJATT codebook, relationships between individuals take four possible values:

0. To indicate the absence of a relationship
1. To indicate acquaintances and distant family ties
2. To indicate friends, moderately close family members, roommates, co-workers, and operational ties, such as those that exist between individuals who ~~w~~worked closely on a bombing together."
3. To indicate close friends, close family members, and ~~t~~tight knit operational cliques (who) would die for each other."[2]

Unfortunately, the distinctions between the categories are unclear. For example, the difference between individuals who worked closely on a bombing together and individuals that are members of the same tight-knit operational clique is imprecise and entirely subjective. The categorization scheme also conflates several types of distinct relationships. For example, while family ties and operational terror ties can overlap, there are an equal number of times when close family members are appalled by their kinsman's participation in jihadist terrorism;[3] therefore, it seems inaccurate to meld familial ties and operational ties into a single category. Finally, it remains unclear how this four-part typology of individual relationships interacts with the three-part typology that Helfstein and Wright used to classify attacks and plots, especially considering that a number of authors, including Bale and Jordán, et al, have argued that different members of the same operational cell often hold different types of relationships with al-Qaida. The definitional ambiguities inherent to the JJATT data and Helfstein and Wright's fuzzy conception of tie strength are ultimately additive and problematize the West Point researchers' findings.

[3] For example, the father of Umar Farouk Abdulmutalab, a Nigerian national who attempted to down a U.S.-flagged jetliner by detonating an explosive hidden in his underwear in December 2009, tried to warn the U.S. State Department that his son was dangerous and might attempt to attack American interests. "One boy's journey to jihad; A former London student, inspired by radical clerics, managed to slip through the intelligence net and launch a suicide mission that nearly brought carnage to America," Sunday Times (London), January 3, 2010.

Comparable issues plague other writers. According to Jordán, et al, the differences between GJNs, local cells, and GJMV groups hinge on the extent of participation of full-fledged members of terror groups. These full-fledged members do not participate in GJNs, but do comprise a portion of the membership of local cells, and entirely staff GJMV groups. However, because the authors never define the boundaries of membership, their argument becomes circular. Rather than clarifying the varying extent of established terror groups' involvement in attacks, their typology merely shifts the discussion to a debate about which individuals met the criteria necessary to be considered full-fledged members of GJMV groups.

Bale is considerably clearer and attempts to use functional criteria to distinguish between categories in his typology, but as his characterization draws heavily on the work of Jordán, et al, he does not entirely escape their definitional failings. Consider the unclear difference between "local jihadist cells organized, supported, and/or directed from abroad" and "self-generating European jihadist cells that are in direct contact with operatives from al-Qa'ida Central."[4] At what point does "direct contact" translate into a measure of support or direction from the parent organization, and without an explicit definition of the boundaries of the parent organization, how is it possible to determine which cells were self-generating and which cells were established to provide a foreign group with a 'local' presence? For all of its nuance, Bale's characterization still hinges on the contentious question of how to define al-Qaida. Clearly, a firm definition of group membership is a necessary component of any attempt to categorize the Islamist terror movement; the second chapter discusses how to do so at length.

Despite this definitional ambiguity, Bale's work represents a step forward, because he begins to resolve many of the conflation issues that undermine earlier attempts to categorize the violent Islamist movement. Unlike the JJATT data and Helfstein and Wright's inquiry, Bale's typology distinguishes between levels based less on subjective judgments of tie strength and more on comparatively clear differences in the type of connection. For example, Bale differentiates between locally-owned jihadist cells and self-generating cells largely on the basis of training: members of the former category received it from established foreign terror groups; members of the latter category did not. Thus, Bale begins to suggest that the many types of relationships that exist between Islamist terrorists must be considered independently in order to untangle the complexities of their interactions.

However, Bale's emphasis on the function of ties is incomplete because he discusses many interactions in vague terms. For example, his "connected self-generating European jihadist cells" often have "direct contact with operatives from al-Qa'ida Central,"[5] but he never specifies the nature of these direct links. Are they financial ties? Are they friendship bonds? Do they stem from worshipping at the same mosques as 'proper' members of al-Qaida? Consequently, it is necessary to consider additional theoretical perspectives in order to fully resolve the definitional ambiguities that problematize efforts to gauge the extent of established extremist groups' participation in terror events.

A number of analysts have obliquely discussed the types of links that exist between terrorists. For example, Richard Clarke, et al, spoke to the importance of family ties when they observed that a "complicated web of marriage alliances" exists between members of Jemmah Islamiyah, the Southeast Asian terror group best remembered for bombing Bali in 2002.[6] Memoirs penned by Omar Nasiri and Ed Husain, both of whom once participated directly in the Islamist movement, describe the importance of comradeship between terrorists,[7] and John Horgan's interview-based work on the psychology of terrorism draws similar, but more formal, conclusions regarding the primary role that affinity bonds play in adoption and maintenance of extremist beliefs.[8] However, Steve Coll's work demonstrates that animosity and outright enmity can also exist between Islamists. His history of South Asian terrorism suggests that Abdullah Azzam, the Palestinian preacher who served as bin Laden's early mentor, was assassinated in 1989 by rivals within the Islamist movement,[9] and his account of the interactions between the Taliban and Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, the Afghan warlord who has led the militant group Hezb-e-Islami for decades, paints a picture of an on-again-off-again relationship that makes a tumultuous teen romance seem comparatively stable.[10]

Beyond characterizations that highlight the existence of individual relationship types, the late Israeli scholar Ehud Sprinzak described several types of qualitatively distinct ties that exist between terrorists in his pre-9/11 work on the "long organizational chain" that supports Palestinian suicide terror.[11] Specifically, he spoke to the existence of planning ties by discussing the "target selection" and "intelligence gathering" that necessarily precede an attack, and he noted the existence of logistical ties in his description of the individuals involved in the ―preparation of explosives" and ―transportation of the suicide bombers to the target area." Finally, Sprinzak's mention of ―physical and _spiritual' training," described both the ideological bonds that exist between adherents of the same worldview and the relationships formed through the shared instruction.[12]

However, the Australian scholar Clive Williams made the largest and most direct contribution to the discourse on relationship types among terrorists. He explicitly recognized that general terms like ―link" and ―tie" are far too vague, because they include ―anything serving to connect one part or thing with another."[13] When used to describe relationships within the jihadist movement, these terms will cause analysts to exaggerate al-Qaida's role in terrorism, because it is likely impossible to find any violent Islamist group that is not tied to al-Qaida in at least some fashion. He argued that six categories of links exist between groups and individuals involved in Islamist terrorism: (1) links related to ―funding for a spiritual leader's activities," (2) links from ―training in Afghanistan, Pakistan or elsewhere," (3) links from training ―at a local level," (4) financial links related to ―regional operational activities," (5) financial links related to ―logistic support, such as weapons and explosives," and (6) links that stem from direct operational partnerships.[14]

When abstracted and combined with the contributions of the scholars who discussed terrorists' relationships in more oblique terms, this framework yields a fairly comprehensive ontology for the study of interactions among violent Islamists:

1. Direct operational links that occur between those who fight together (Williams 6),
2. Logistical links that occur through the provision of manpower and materiel (Williams 5; Sprinzak),
3. Planning links that occur through target selection and/or the conduct of surveillance (Sprinzak),
4. Financial links that occur through the direct provision of money (Williams 1,4, & 5),
5. Training links that occur through teaching and shared instruction (Williams 2 & 3; Sprinzak),
6. Ideological links that occur through explicit interactions of a spiritual or religious nature (Williams 1; Sprinzak; Horgan),
7. Family links that occur through shared bloodlines or marriage (Clarke, et al),
8. Friendship links that develop through mutual affinity (Nasiri, Husain, Horgan),
9. Enmity links that develop as the result of personal animus or competition (Coll).

Unfortunately, practical constraints preclude this ontology's implementation in its unadulterated form. Raw data on terrorism is of notoriously poor quality,[15] and, as Carlo Morselli's noted in his more general characterization of clandestine networks, it is often necessary to couch interactions in terms of uncertainty, because some sources, even official ones, merely allege that individuals shared a relationship or played a role in an event, without offering definitive evidence.[16]

Fahim Ansari's uncertain involvement in the 2008 Mumbai rampage is illustrative. Although Indian law enforcement argued that Ansari had "meticulously prepared" hand-drawn maps to enable the LeT attack team to maneuver through South Mumbai's hectic urban landscape,[17] an Indian court acquitted Ansari of any involvement in the attack,[18] and David

Headley, an American, has since pleaded guilty to conducting the bulk of the reconnaissance in preparation for the attack.[19] Still, as of the fall of 2011, Indian prosecutors hoped to pin charges on Ansari.[20] It remains unclear what role, if any, he played in the Mumbai attacks. Therefore, when the source material offers mutually exclusive portrayals of an individual's involvement, and when the source material is overt in specifying the speculative nature of an interaction, it is necessary to add an additional category:

10. Uncertain links that may or may not have taken place (Morselli).

Moreover, information on some specific link types is frustratingly sparse; open-sources are exceptionally inconsistent in their coverage of the individuals involved in clandestine financial transfers. For a small number of events, detailed information is available, and it is possible to follow money from person-to-person, but attack funding is more often attributed to a region, rather than a person or group. For example, the U.S. Treasury department describes how Ruben Omar Lavilla, one of the three men explicitly named as a participant in the 2004 bombing of SuperFerry 14 in the Philippines, channeled money from his "personal Arab contacts" to Filipino extremists,[21] but the open-source data never specifies the names or organizational affiliations of Lavilla's contacts in the Middle East. It is also worth noting that this analysis' specific emphasis on attacks and plots largely precluded the inclusion of more diffuse funding links, as epitomized by several crooked charities' contributions to al-Qaida's general operating fund.[22] Preliminary analyses conducted on the snowball sample demonstrated that these sorts of ambiguities were prevalent enough to preclude attack-finance ties from consistently serving as a stand-alone category of analysis.

In other instances, sources described links in exceptionally general terms. For example, in its description of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed's activities in the mid-1990s, the 9/11 Commission Report mentions a meeting with Abu Hafs al-Masri, an Egyptian who all sources agree was one of bin Laden's top lieutenants:

> "KSM continued to travel among the worldwide jihadist community . . . visiting the Sudan, Yemen, Malaysia, and Brazil in 1995. No clear evidence connects him to terrorist activities in those locations. While in Sudan, he reportedly failed in his attempt to meet with Bin Ladin. But KSM did see Atef, who gave him a contact in Brazil."[23]

While it is clear that a meeting took place and that the interaction was vaguely operational in nature, it is unclear what the men discussed. If they considered a specific attack, the meeting may have dealt with planning. If Atef's Brazilian contact was a source of manpower or materiel to support one of KSM's myriad operations, the meeting may have also been logistical in nature. Similarly, the meeting may have been financial in nature, if Atef's Brazilian contact was a source of funds, or if Atef provided KSM with some money to facilitate his travel. Given that the data contains thousands of other similar examples, the boundaries between these types of ties were indistinct, making it impossible to consider them as separate categories of analysis in all situations.

Ultimately, theory had to yield to practicality and some of the link types had to be amalgamated to create an ontology robust enough to support formal methods. Therefore, when considering high-level questions such as responsibility for an attack, the analysis considered the following types of links:

[23] National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States (9/11 Commission), Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, (New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2004), p. 148. (Hereafter "The 9/11 Report").

1. Functional links formed through operational interactions, planning interactions, logistical interactions, and/or financial interactions.

2. Training links formed through shared teaching or instruction.

3. Ideological links formed through explicit interactions of a spiritual or religious nature.

4. Family links formed through shared bloodlines or marriage.

5. Friendship links formed through mutual affinity.

6. Enmity links formed through personal animus or competition.

7. Uncertain links that may or may not have taken place.

However, this necessary amalgamation does not come without cost. Some of the more nuanced characterizations vanish from the data, and the dedicated emphasis on attacks and plots likely precludes the data from fully describing "financial" members of al-Qaida, whose support shapes the organization, but who otherwise exist outside al-Qaida's locus of decision-making. That said, Jemaah Islamiyah's internal system of finance, which generates operating funds by taxing five percent of members' incomes, demonstrates that finance and membership are often intricately intertwined,[24] and because this study's ultimate aim is to characterize the extent of organizational involvement in terror events, there is a sound rationale for the potentially contentious amalgamation of financial and operational ties, as it is difficult to argue that individuals who provide money in direct support of an attack lack culpability for its outcome. Hopefully, as more information on terrorist finance trickles into the open source, the available data on money flows will become robust enough to allow for its analysis as a separate category of interaction and future analyses will be able to examine the nature of organizational involvement in terror events at a finer level of abstraction. In the interim, Figure 1.6 summarizes the frequency of various relationship types within the snowball data sample.

With the definitional framework reasonably well-addressed, it is time to return to the issues of tie strength that have preoccupied terror theorists' attempts to classify the nature of al-Qaida's involvement in attacks and plots. Network theorists have offered several alternatives to non-replicable intuitive approaches, but unfortunately the nature of data on terrorism precludes most implementations. Granovetter, whose argument on the importance of weak ties first sparked the debate about how to quantify relationships, proposed that the strength of a tie probably relates linearly to some "combination of the amount of time, the emotional intensity, the intimacy (mutual confiding), and the reciprocal services which characterize the tie."[25] However, he postponed questions of how to measure and index such variables "to future empirical studies."[26]

Given the rather weighty data requirements imposed by Granovetter's characterization, survey-based approaches have abounded.[27] While rigorous, they are well suited neither to large networks, in which tens of thousands surveys would be needed to quantify the various relationships between actors, nor to clandestine topics, in which the very possibility of distributing surveys to subjects becomes farcical. Consequently, other researchers, including Granovetter, have treated the issue by proxy and have adopted simple continuous measurements that determine tie strength by summing the frequency of interactions between two agents.[28] This approach suits the available open-source data on terrorism and serves as the foundation for this study's treatment of the strength of individual interactions.

However, a minor adjustment to Granovetter's approach was necessary to accommodate the dynamic network analysis perspective. In order to enable the analysis to highlight the severance of relationships, this study adopted a time-based additive approach. Specifically, all interactions were coded in simple binary terms and then summed across calendar year and link type. So, for example, if actor "A" passed bomb-making materials to actor "B" three times in 2005, and also shared audio recordings of radical sermons with actor ~~B~~" twice in that same year, then in 2005, the pair's functional relationship would be of strength 3, and their ideological relationship of strength 2. The data on 2005 has no bearing on the following year; the pair's relationships in 2006 would be evaluated independently, though it remained possible to calculate cumulative relationship strengths through simple addition when merited by the project's analytic demands.

The primary benefits to this approach are that it allows relationships to change over time, as interactions vary in strength from year-to-year, while avoiding the ambiguity inherent to subjective descriptions of tie strength. The primary limitation to this approach is that the calendar year is a somewhat arbitrary dividing line that can artificially break a continual stream of interactions into two less profound annual estimates of a relationship. The resulting over-time characterizations must necessarily be interpreted in fuzzy terms.

How does this characterization of the intensity of relationships fit into a larger theoretical picture? Ultimately, this study's analytic framework synthesizes a Granovettric characterization of tie strength with the literature that Sprinzak, Williams, and other scholars have created to describe the nature of relationships, in order to modify Bale's nuanced system of classifying various levels of al-Qaida involvement. Bale already explicitly considered the nature and strength of ties, so the characterization outlined below merely draws on the other literatures to refine these distinctions. The largest difference between Bale's original characterization and this study's offering is a shift from the description of groups to a description of events. Because groups are tied to events (and events to groups), this change primarily constitutes a refocusing of perspective that more easily highlights organizational adaptation on the part of terrorists by making it possible for al-Qaida to interact with groups of actors in different ways on different attacks, even within the same period of analysis. Put more simply, this accommodation paints a more nuanced picture by allowing organizations' roles to vary from event-to-event.

Temporarily setting aside definitional questions of how to divide between weak and strong involvement in events—a topic discussed in detail in the third chapter—various aspects of the network data allow al-Qaida's involvement in any attack to be classified in any of the following five categories:

1. Attacks and plots with _strong' functional and/or training links to the organization.
    a. Events that do not display functional links to al-Qaida and/or strong training links to al-Qaida are excluded from this category.
    b. The characterization of tie strength allows an additional narrowing of the field, by excluding those events with weak al-Qaida involvement.
    c. Geographical data, drawn from the dynamic network's event x location matrix, allows an additional narrowing of the field, by excluding events conducted by hit squads deployed to the West.
2. Attacks and plots conducted by al-Qaida "hit squads" deployed to the West.
    a. Events that do not display functional links to al-Qaida and/or strong training links to al-Qaida are excluded from this category.
    b. Additional events are excluded based on tie strength; this category excludes weakly-tied events.
    c. Non-Western events are excluded in order to distinguish this category from the previous one.
3. Attacks and plots with _weak' functional and/or training connections to al-Qaida.
    a. Events that do not display functional links to al-Qaida and/or training links to al-Qaida are excluded from this category.
    b. Additional events are excluded based on tie strength; this category excludes all strongly-tied events.
    c. This categorization does not include a geographic component.
4. Attacks and plots tied to individuals who formerly held strong ties to al-Qaida, but now operate independent of the organization.
    a. Determinations of tie strength enable differentiation by excluding events conducted by individuals that never held strong ties to al-Qaida.
    b. The annualized nature of the dynamic data makes it possible to determine "end dates" for individuals' involvement with al-Qaida; this information enables additional exclusions by removing all people with ongoing ties to al-Qaida from this category.

5. Attacks and plots with explicit ideological ties to al-Qaida.
    a. Events that display functional ties to al-Qaida and/or strong training links to al-Qaida are excluded from this category, leaving events that are primarily tied to al-Qaida through weak ideological bonds or through exceptionally uncertain links
6. Attacks and plots with no links to al-Qaida.
    a. Events that display links of any type to anyone who has ever held ties to al-Qaida are excluded from this category.

The jihadists that Bale describes as local cells planted in the West with long-term objectives are beyond the scope of this inquiry, because their stated mission is long-term logistical and financial support of the broader organization, rather than direct support of attacks. Similarly, it is important to note that the sixth category is not synonymous with the self-organization grassroots organizations described by Sageman and Jordan, et al, because this category includes attacks and plots conducted by recognized terror groups that merely lack demonstrable ties to bin Laden‘s organization. Indeed, as estimates provided by the third chapter demonstrate, many of these self-organizing groups more accurately fall within the fifth Baleian category.

1.6 FROM THEORY TO IMPLEMENTATION: AN OUTLINE OF CHAPTERS

Because it is impossible to determine how al-Qaida is connected to an event without first explicitly defining the organization‘s boundaries, the second chapter discusses the need for a methodologically rigorous definition of terror groups, before describing a network-based grouping method that utilizes the snowball sample to offer one reasonable solution to the problems inherent to existing definitional approaches. This chapter closes by testing the output of the grouping model against expert characterizations of terror groups‘ membership. However, because reliable, full membership rosters for contemporary terror groups simply do not exist in the open-source, this test offers only partial proof of concept for the membership model, not complete validation.

The third chapter, which is also methodological in nature, turns its attention to the question of implementation. This chapter explains how the analysis moves from individual-level characterizations of involvement in events to formal estimates of organizational involvement in terrorist events. The chapter then revisits the distinction between ―weak" and ―strong" involvement in attacks and describing a non-subjective means of differentiating between these levels. These findings then serve to classify the plots and attacks listed in the snowball data sample into the six-tiered, events-oriented Baleian typology outlined above. Therefore, this chapter contributes to the theoretical literature on terrorism by offering a broad estimation of the relative frequencies of patterns of al-Qaida involvement. Although the patterns that this chapter finds rely heavily on the membership model's definitions of organizational boundaries, the processes outlined could be applied to any membership list that an analyst chose to use; therefore, this chapter also makes a useful amendment to the methodological discourse on terrorism.

The findings of the third chapter serve as a metric that aids in the selection of representative cases, and the remaining topical chapters turn their attention toward issues of within-group variability and use case study to explore patterns of change over time within the categories of the Baleian typology. Toward that end, the fourth chapter discusses attacks and plots with strong links to al-Qaida that take place in the organization's back yard and examines patterns of training, finance, logistics, and operations among the individuals involved in three cases: (1) the 1998 bombings of U.S. Embassies in Eastern Africa, (2) the 2002 Mombasa attacks on Israeli-linked targets, and (3) a string of bombings conducted in Pakistan in 2004 under the leadership of two men who ‗graduated' from one of al-Qaida's Waziristan-based camps immediately prior to the terror campaign. Broadly speaking, the comparison of these cases suggests that the scale of al-Qaida's operations and the quality of its operatives have decreased steadily over time. Similarly, the scale of support that bin Laden's organization has been able to offer operatives has decreased steadily, and even those individuals with strong ties to al-Qaida have had to either become more self-reliant or have had to partner with outside organizations in order to accomplish attacks.

The fifth chapter discusses hit squads deployed by al-Qaida to the West. It discusses five cases: (1) the 9/11 attacks of 2001; (2) a 2004 fertilizer-bomb plot against London, (3) the July 7, 2005, London bombings, which featured some of the same players as the 2004 plot; (4) the failed July 21, 2005, attack on London, which shared training ties to the previous attack; and (5) a 2009 plot against New York city's subway system conducted by three long-time residents of the United States shortly after they graduated from an al-Qaida training camp, which shared diffuse training ties to the two previous cases. However, as the events of 9/11 are well known and have been described in thorough detail elsewhere,[29] this case is considered primarily for comparative purposes. The results of this comparison demonstrate that similar patterns characterize both al-Qaida's Western and non-Western operations over time: the scale of hit squad attacks have decreased over time; the quality of hit squad operatives, as measured by the extent of their training, has similarly decreased over time, and it seems that the amount of financial and logistical support al-Qaida provides to these operatives has decreased substantially over time.

The sixth chapter turns its attention toward plots and attacks with weak connections to al-Qaida. It considers five cases drawn from Indonesia: (1) the 2002 Bali bombings, (2) the 2003 bombing of the Jakarta Marriott, (3) the 2004 bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta, (4) the 2005 Bali bombings, and (5) the 2009 near-simultaneous bombings of the Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels in Jakarta. This chapter argues that relationships within the violent Islamist community have a certain evolutionary character, as evidenced by Noordin's gradual creation of a new independent terrorist organization. In terms of theory, this chapter has implications for the literature that describes the causes of organizational fracture among terror groups, as Noordin's experience demonstrates that splinters do not always form in sharp response to peace settlements or other events that cause an immediate rift between organizations' hard-line and moderate members.

The seventh chapter deals with plots and events involving individuals who formerly held close ties to al-Qaida, but who now operate independent of bin Laden's organization. Data fidelity precludes this chapter from fully adopting the events-based perspective utilized in other chapters; there for the chapter examines two cases at the organizational level: (1) al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb and (2) al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula. The findings of this section reinforce the evolutionary arguments put forth in the previous chapter, while simultaneously aiding in the creation of a theory that addresses why relationships among violent Islamists degrade over time. It seems that access to financial resources obtained from crime may be causally related to the extent of violent Islamists' functional independence from parent organizations.

The eighth chapter turns its attention to plots and attacks conducted by individuals with loose, non-functional ties to al-Qaida. Given the breadth of the topic, case selection is particularly challenging, so this study employed a double-binding constraint to ensure comparability of cases and discusses only those events that took place in the United States and targeted military personnel. Three cases emerge: (1) the 2007 plot against Fort Dix in New Jersey, (2) the 2009 shooting at an Army recruiting station in Little Rock, Arkansas, and (3) the 2009 shootings at Fort Hood in Texas. While such plots remain of concern, this chapter finds that both the threat that they pose and their connection to al-Qaida are typically exaggerated. Moreover, this chapter questions the extent of the role that online propaganda, which constitutes these plots' primary ties to al-Qaida, plays in the indoctrination process, as social ties to existing jihadists seemed to play a more dominant role.

Because the final Baleian category deals with attacks and plots that have no connection to al-Qaida, it is omitted from discussion on the grounds that it falls beyond the bounds of this study. Therefore, the ninth and final chapter offers some general conclusions and makes policy recommendations regarding how to best combat the threat posed by al-Qaida.

2.0 CUTTING THE PIECES OF THE JIHADIST JIGSAW PUZZLE: HOW TO DEFINE MEMBERSHIP IN ISLAMIST TERROR GROUPS USING IMPERFECT DATA AND WHY THE PROCESS IS IMPORTANT

Defining al-Qaida is difficult, but important. Unfortunately, no consensus exists regarding the nature of the organization. To some, al-Qaida is a finite group with a well-defined membership and explicit organizational boundaries. To others, al-Qaida is more of an ideology, to which any motivated individual can self-subscribe prior to undertaking violence aimed at furthering the Islamist cause.[1] Consequently, estimates of the number of individuals who have ever held membership in the organization range from "several hundred"[2] to at least 70,000.[3] Such disagreements matter because they are the root cause of substantial debate surrounding al-Qaida's role in various attacks, which in turn shapes policy arguments about how to best combat the threat of Islamist terrorism.

Following this introduction, this chapter contains three sections that explore the nature of membership in al-Qaida. The first section highlights the need for a formal, functional definition of al-Qaida by discussing the shortcomings associated with traditional criteria used to determine membership in Islamist terror groups. Network-based grouping methods and their applicability to the modeling of terrorist organizations are the subjects of the second section, which closes by outlining the procedures this analysis followed to create a formal model of al-Qaida membership. The third and final section turns its attention to results and compares the output of the formal grouping method against expert characterizations of membership, in order to address questions of model fit to the greatest extent allowed by the ambiguity-ridden subject matter.

2.1 THE IMPORTANCE OF DEFINITIONS

Definitions matter because they shape policy. This statement is easily tested in the realm of counterterrorism by considering the implications of viewing al-Qaida in the widest possible terms: when analysts use ―al-Qaida" as a perfect synonym for the larger violent Islamist movement, it seems that the jihadist threat can be neutralized by eliminating a single organization that is responsible for virtually every attack. More finite definitions of the organization draw additional boundaries within the Islamist terror movement, thereby arguing that counterterrorism policy must combat multiple, distinct terror groups to mitigate the jihadist threat. Thus, determining if and where to draw the lines between terror organizations is more than an academic exercise in classification; it has practical implications that affect national and international security.

Unfortunately, there is no straightforward process for finding the boundaries of Islamist terror groups. The easiest solution is to simply rely on classifications found in existing descriptions of the jihadist threat.[4] However, because journalists and scholars are rarely explicit about how they define al-Qaida or other terror groups, the secondary source-material on jihadist terrorism is replete with conflicting and irreconcilable accounts of organizations' membership.

[4] For example, the Center for Computational Analysis of Social and Organizational Systems (CASOS) has adopted this perspective in the construction of its counterterrorism database. Luke M. Gerdes, ―Codebook for Network Data on Individuals Involved with Terrorism and Counterterrorism," Carnegie Mellon University, School of Computer Science, Institute for Software Research, Technical Report CMU-ISR-08-136, October 10, 2008; available online: http://www.casos.cs.cmu.edu/publications/papers.php.

The 2004 attacks on Madrid's commuter rail system offer a useful illustration. Scott Atran, an American scholar with extensive experience consulting on national security issues for the U.S. government, claims that the Madrid bombers worked independent of support from bin Laden's organization. "There isn't the slightest bit of evidence of any relationship with al-Qaida," Atran stated. "We've been looking at it closely for years and we've been briefed by everybody under the sun ... and nothing connects them."[5] Fernando Reinares, a Spanish scholar, disagrees and argues that the Madrid bombers had "international connections" with both al-Qaida and its affiliated organizations.[6] Jeffrey Bale's characterization of the attack includes the aspect of time; he argues that the Madrid bombers formerly held ties to al-Qaida, but reformed as an independent network prior to conducting the attacks.[7] Jose A. Rodriguez, a Spanish network analyst, takes arguments about al-Qaida's involvement in the Madrid attacks to their farthest extreme and argues that "the March 11th terrorist cell . . . is also linked to, and a part of, al Qaeda's much larger and more diffuse network."[8] Although these scholars debate the nature and extent of some participants' roles, there is a surprising level of consensus regarding the specific individuals involved in the attacks; therefore, the academic community's widely divergent conclusions about the extent of the Madrid bombers' affiliations with al-Qaida stem primarily from irreconcilable views about where to bound al-Qaida as an organization. Given such discord, existing characterizations of membership cannot be trusted at face value.

Another approach to determining membership centers on compiling a list of followers who "made bayat" by swearing oaths of allegiance to a terrorist leader or a terrorist organization. While these oaths makes it possible, at least in some theoretical sense, to construct membership rosters for terror groups, such attempts require nearly perfect information, which is not available because terrorist organizations are, by their very nature, clandestine. Intelligence analysts working with highly classified data might be able to reconstruct such lists by analyzing the contents of computer hard drives seized during the capture of high-level terrorists, but even with the best data available, the task remains herculean and fraught with gaps.

In large part, this difficulty stems from organizational adaptation on the part of the terrorists. Egyptian Islamic Jihad (EIJ) suffered tremendous operational losses in the mid-1990s, when hundreds of members were arrested after the Egyptian intelligence service seized a copy of EIJ's membership roster during the arrest of a high-ranking leader.[9] As this incident is well known in Islamist circles, it presumably serves as a cautionary tale that makes jihadists leery of committing too much information to storage in physical or digital files.[10] [9] Lawrence Wright, The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, (New York: Vintage Books, 2006), pp. 209-210.

[10] At first blush, the experience of Mohammed Naem Noor Khan, a Pakistani computer engineer, seems to contradict this statement. He was characterized as a hub in al-Qaida's communications network at the time of his arrest in 2004, because his computer hard-drive contained contact information on several terrorists in South Asia and Britain. However, Pakistani authorities released Khan in 2007, without ever filing any charges against him. Knowledgeable observers, including former counterterrorism tsar Richard Clarke, have suggested that Khan was working with Pakistani authorities in a sting-operation against al-Qaida. Thus, while the wave of arrests that stemmed from information contained on Khan's hard drive demonstrates that computer records can serve as valuable "membership lists," Khan's example says little about terrorists' reticence to record information, as he was likely working at the authorities' behest. For early characterizations of Khan's role in al-Qaida, see: Doug Saunders, "Al-Qaeda raid in Pakistan led to arrests in London; British officials say information gathered is not enough to raise terror alert levels," The Globe and Mail (Canada), August 6, 2004; "Outisde view: Focus on Pakistan's jihadis," United Press International, August 9, 2004; "Naeem was top terror planner," The Pakistan Newswire, August 4, 2004. For an account of Khan's release, see: Habibullah Khan and Maddy Sauer, "Pakistan Computer Expert With Alleged Al Qaeda Ties Released," ABC News, August 21, 2007.

Beyond the information challenges associated with an oath-based approach, questions remain about its utility. Defining al-Qaida's membership based exclusively around the ideal of bayat would exclude several individuals intimately involved in the organization's operations, because a number of people participated in al-Qaida attacks without first swearing allegiance to bin Laden.[11] Most famously, Khalid Sheikh Muhammad (KSM), the acknowledged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, delayed pledging loyalty to bin Laden for as long as possible. He did not take an oath until well after the September 11th attacks and only did so because members of al-Qaida's leadership convinced him that his refusal set a poor example for the organization's rank-and-file.[12] Yet, by any functional definition, KSM had been a member of the organization for years.

Nor is this pattern unique to al-Qaida. Yasin Syawal offers an example that demonstrates the disutility of bayat as a proxy for organizational membership in a Southeast Asian context. Syawal, an Indonesian, first became involved in jihadist violence in the mid-1980s, in Afghanistan, where he fought against the Soviets alongside several of the men who would go on to found al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah (JI).[13] He also married into the movement, by wedding the step-daughter of Abdullah Sungkar, who served as JI's emir from the organization's founding in 1993 until his death in 1999. By the late 1990s, Syawal had become involved in both attack-planning and terror training; he attended a 1999 meeting that discussed assassination targets, including the president of Indonesia,[14] and he instructed recruits at Camp Hudiebiyah, a JI facility that operated on the remote southern Philippine island of Mindanao until it was over-run by the Armed Forces of the Philippines in July 2000.[15] But despite holding familial, operational, and training ties that bound him to JI, Syawal clung to a façade of independence and refused to swear fealty to Sungkar or his successors.[16] When viewed alongside KSM's complicated relationship to al-Qaida, Syawal's experience with JI demonstrates that bayat is a poor measure of membership for two of the world's best-known Islamist terror organizations. It is hardly an intellectual leap to assume that this pattern applies more broadly to the jihadist movement.

Moreover, a lack of enforcement mechanisms often problematizes oath-based definitions of terror groups. There are isolated examples of terror leaders imposing corporal punishments—even including execution—on wayward members,[17] but many groups have seen little need for a codified system of penalties, because oath-takers' religious devotion theoretically ensures compliance. According to information obtained from KSM after his 2003 capture, violations of bayat within al-Qaida ~~–~~were considered to be between the individual and God."[18] Consequently, individuals were free to be as insubordinate as allowed by their individual fears of divine retribution or subsequent re-evaluations of the justness of their organization's leadership. Indeed, this theological loophole allowed some prominent followers of bin Laden to operate virtually independently, despite their promise to heed the commands of al-Qaida's leadership.

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian who led al-Qaida in Mesopotamia until his death in June 2006, offers a useful illustration. Despite making bayat to bin Laden in October 2004,[19] Zarqawi engaged in widespread violence against Iraqi Shiites throughout 2005.[20] These actions were in open defiance of al-Qaida's leadership, which felt that sectarian violence in Iraq created dissent among insurgents that was inimical to the organization's larger goal of defeating the American military. With no formal means to discipline Zarqawi, Ayman al-Zawahiri, the Egyptian physician who long-served as bin Laden's second-in-command, could do little more than cajole the wayward Jordanian back into line with al-Qaida's polices. Toward that end, Zawahiri wrote a letter, later captured by American forces, that attempted to influence Zarqawi's behavior, but Zarqawi's supposed superior stopped well short of issuing commands.[21]

As an even more egregious example of the fallibility of bayat, consider Jamal Ahmed Mohamed al-Fadl. Sudanese by birth, al-Fadl fell-in with a radical crowd after moving to Brooklyn and attending the Farouq Mosque, where Omar Abdel Rahman, the Blind Sheikh, began leading services in 1987.[22] By 1988, al-Fadl had acquired terror training in Afghanistan, at Khalid Ibn Walid Camp, and the following year, he swore a formal oath of allegiance to al-Qaida's leadership. Al-Fadl rose fairly high in the organization; he reported directly to al-Qaida's Shura Council and ostensibly functioned as bin Laden's personal secretary during the dissident Saudi's sojourn to the Sudan. But al-Fadl felt undervalued. He embezzled $110,000 of al-Qaida funds because he was angry that his salary was lower than that of several EIJ members on bin Laden's payroll. When confronted, al-Fadl fled the Sudan, and in 1996, he walked into an American Embassy to offer his services as an informant. Al-Fadl ultimately became the U.S. Justice Department's star witness in the trial of the perpetrators of the 1998 bombings of U.S. Embassies in Nairobi, Kenya, and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania.[23] His formal pledge of loyalty precluded al-Fadl neither from stealing al-Qaida's funds nor from taking actions that condemned several of his brethren to life-long imprisonment.[24]

Such examples demonstrate that terror leaders' power stems from their ability to inspire, guide, and encourage followers, rather than from the sort of true command and control held by military officers in traditional state-based armies. Individual members' ability to re-interpret the context and meaning of their oaths of allegiance preclude lists of sworn followers from serving as a reliable proxy for functional membership in terrorist organizations, because these oaths fail to ensure compliance with organizational goals. In short, bayat can be fleeting.

2.2 NETWORK-BASED GROUPING METHODS

What means exist to overcome the inconsistencies the plague the secondary literature's characterization of organizational affiliations and the shortfalls of oath-based approaches to determining group membership? Formal, network-based models of group membership offer one reasonable solution. The difficulty lies in choosing the right grouping method.

Scholars have devised an almost limitless number of techniques and variations, which differ greatly in their ability to find accurate boundaries between terror groups. Many of the simplest, best-known methods are far too restrictive. For example, groupings known in network-speak as ―cliques" have unrealistic membership requirements that clash with the even the most basic understanding of real-world organizations.

Cliques exist when all members share connections with each other, and the group is ―maximal" because it cannot be made larger by including another member. However, all members of large organizations are unlikely to know one another. It would be foolish to assume that all faculty members in a large university were personally acquainted, much less to assume that all members of a violent clandestine organization, which may deliberately isolate components of the organization in the name of operational security, were members of a single formal clique. Real-world organizations contain several overlapping cliques, as well as a number of other individuals who exist outside of these structures. Ultimately, cliques and the countless other clique-like measurements are ill-suited to determining the boundaries of Islamist terror groups.

Even the briefest comparison between the nature of the jihadist threat and the mathematical input requirements of potentially useful grouping algorithms allows the field of candidates to be narrowed considerably further, because the vast majority of non-clique-like grouping methods require a-priori knowledge of the number of groups that exist in the data. These algorithms are useful for predicting how members are likely to align in the event of an organizational fissure, by simulating the groupings that would likely result if an organization split into two, three, or four distinct components, but these methods are ill-suited to a broad study of membership among Islamist terrorists, because, for reasons illustrated below, the total number of groups involved in the jihadist movement remains unknown.

An accurate count of the number of Islamist terror groups remains exceptionally difficult to complete, because many groups that claim attacks may exist in name only. The best known such group is undoubtedly the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades, an ‗organization' that has claimed responsibility for attacks in Turkey, Indonesia, the United Kingdom, and Spain, as well as for a 2003 power black-out in the Northeast United States—a case in which authorities have ruled out any possibility of sabotage.[25] Knowledgeable observers almost unanimously agree that this group does not exist.[26] Instead, the al-Masri Brigades seem to be a ruse designed to panic Westerners into believing that extremists present a unified threat with global reach. If the organization's claims are accepted at face value, then several distinct terror groups would blend into one, resulting in a wildly inaccurate count.

Organizational mergers complicate estimates of the number of active terror organizations in a similar fashion. Al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), one of several organizations claiming regional partnerships with bin Laden's organization, offers an example. Despite the similarity of the organizations' names, the nature and depth of AQIM's relationship to al-Qaida remains ambiguous. Do the organizations share day-to-day operations? Are there sporadic and intermittent financial partnerships? Or, do these allegiances exist in name only, at a purely ideological level? Until such questions are satisfactorily answered in relation to al-Qaida's many regional ‗partners,' it would be irresponsible to implement any formal method that required the analyst to specify the number of divisions that the grouping process should find, because it remains unclear whether or not these groups are truly part of al-Qaida.

In practice, this restriction eliminates all but Newman's grouping process, the only grouping method that can find meaningful group divisions within large networks absent any user-specified information on the number of groups that exist within the data.[27] Named for its discoverer, this method operates according to a simple underlying logic: individuals within a natural group will share more ties between each other than between non-members.[28] Consequently, the method centers on finding the individuals who play the largest role in binding together the network. These individuals score highest in a network measure known as betweenness, which scores the extent to which actors function as bridges that connect disparate sub-groups that would otherwise remain untied.[29]

After finding the individual with the highest betweenness, the Newman method simulates his removal, and then tests the fit of the simulated split against data that contains identical group divisions, but random patterns of links. When the value of this comparison, known as a modularity score, approaches zero, the simulated divisions perform no better than random data. When modularity approaches the theoretical maximum of one—in practice, scores above 0.7 are

[27] Although CONCOR grouping (CONvergence of iterated CORrelations) can also be conducted without any underlying knowledge of the number of organizations that exist within the data, this method is an improper choice for this analysis, because CONCOR groups actors based on structural equivalence. In plain language, CONCOR finds individuals who share similar patterns of ties and thus play similar roles within the network. Consequently, this method provides a measure of individuals' redundancy in the network and does not find boundaries between organizations within the data. Indeed, several CONCOR groups are likely to exist within the same organization. Because it assesses the role of interstitial individuals and allows for multiple membership, Davis and Carley's Fuzzy Overlapping Groups (FOG) algorithm has much appeal for this sort of analysis, but the original K-FOG algorithm requires users to specify the number of groups (K) in the data, and the alpha-FOG algorithm, which suggests the number of groups based on a user-specified error tolerance, is too computationally complex to be applied to large networks. Attempts to do so are beyond the calculative power of current technology. Consequently, efforts to implement alpha-FOG on the data derived from the snowball sampling process caused repeated computer crashes. Thus, Newman is the only grouping option available. For an accessible and fairly non-technical discussion of CONCOR and the broader topic of structural equivalence, see: John Scott, Social Network Analysis: A Handbook, 2nd Edition, (Los Angeles, CA: Sage, 2001), pp. 124-138. rare—there is strong evidence that the simulated groupings are non-random and, therefore, meaningful.[30]

However, the Newman method does not stop after this first division; the process is iterative. It simulates the deletion of each node in sequence according to its betweenness scores, until the method has divided the network into a series of disconnected isolate nodes. Because the process produces modularity scores after each simulated removal, this method is able to find the most meaningful result, by finding the simulation that produces the highest modularity score. Thus, the final output is a single graph displaying the group divisions most likely to be meaningful.[31]

Just how probable are these ―most likely divisions"? The exact mathematical answer varies from case to case, but the Newman method performs with admirable accuracy. When benchmarked against real-world data, in which ethnographers observed and recorded group splits, and when tested against computer generated data, this process correctly classified about 90 percent of actors.[32] Consequently, the Newman method is well suited to the study of jihadist terrorism, because it offers an elegant method to find ‗natural' groups, without requiring the user to specify the number of divisions that exist within the data.

The trick of applying the method involves determining which sorts of relationships to include in the grouping analysis. Organizational theory argues that group membership choices are determined by a confluence of factors, including: friendship choices, family relationships, ideological affinities, operational overlaps, and financial interactions. In order to encompass this complexity, there is little sense in excluding any specific type of interaction, save enmity ties and ties exceptionally unlikely to have taken place, during the initial grouping.

However, implementing the Newman grouping process in a multi-modal, multi-relational network is a somewhat more complicated process, because this method performs erratically when data is not in a uni-relational, one-mode format.[33] A substantial amount of data pre-processing must consequently be conducted prior to implementing the method. Unfortunately, standard approaches to data transformation carry significant analytic cost when applied to weighted data that scales the strength of relationships.

Analysts typically derive one-mode matrixes from two-mode data via a "folding" process that makes use of basic matrix multiplication.[34] To understand how this process works, consider the simple two-mode network depicted in figure 2.1, which shows four friends' participation in celebrations held on four major American holidays.[35]

It is possible to infer relationships among the friends based on their co-attendance of the same holiday events. As summarized by figure 2.2, the process begins by transposing the rows and columns in the original matrix.

The original matrix is then multiplied with the transpose in order to restate the information as an agent x agent network, in which the diagonal values summarize the number of events in which each individual participated, and the remaining fields in the matrix contain binary relational data inferred from the friends' co-participation in events. Values of ~~"1"~~" indicate that an interaction took place; values of ~~"0"~~" indicate that one did not.

While this multiplicative process works well for binary data, folding creates significant distortions when applied to weighted data, such as that contained in the annualized snowball sample. Figure 2.4, which reprises the holiday example to consider weighted interactions, demonstrates that the arithmetic involved in the folding process produces agent x agent interactions of exaggerated scale when analysts apply the process to non-binary data.

Researchers often resolve this problem by simply ignoring the weighting of the original two-mode matrix and treating the folding process as a Boolean operation that produces binarized one-mode matrixes, in which a value of 0 indicates the absence of a relationship between a pair of agents, and a value of 1 indicates the presence of a relationship of unknown strength between a pair of agents. While this binarization process standardizes results, it also obliterates any information that the original two-mode matrix contained on the strength of interactions. Moreover, multi-modal data containing three or more types of nodes has special characteristics that may undermine the fidelity of data ultimately obtained from the binarization process.

As an example, consider the simple network depicted in figure 2.5, which contains four agents (Tom, Dick, Harry, and Bob), one event (Thanksgiving), and one resource (food). Intuitively, it is clear that that the agent x event and agent x resource networks cannot be combined without first transforming each network into one-mode agent x agent data, because holidays and resources cannot be summed, as they are fundamentally different classes of nodes. However, if an analyst were to implement a Boolean approach to data transformation and obtain binarized agent x agent networks from the agent x event and agent x resource matrixes, before summing the pair of one-mode networks to create a composite matrix showing all ties between the individuals in the network, then the data processing would contain implicit judgments about the relative importance of interactions. Specifically, the final output would weight relationships between individuals like Tom and Harry, who share interactions across multiple modes, more heavily than interactions between individuals like Tom and Dick, who share a single stronger interaction within a single mode. Put most simply, a ―binarize and fold, then sum" approach to network transformation has tremendous potential to misstate information that the original matrix contained regarding the observed strength of relationships between agents.

Researchers are left with few appealing options. They can either ignore the problem and use the questionable weightings that result from the ―binarize and fold, then sum" approach, or they can re-binarize the data, in which causes the final agent x agent network to be abstracted from the observed interactions by an additional step of data pre-processing—a step which obliterates any and all observed variations in relative tie strength contained in the original data. There are no hard and fast rules about how far removed from reality data can be before it loses its analytic value, so these processes may be appropriate to certain research questions, but it is also quite clear that data containing three or more modes becomes greatly distorted when processed using binary approaches to transformation.

As a final alternative, analysts can ignore the overly-large values that matrix multiplication produces when applied to weighted multi-modal data and use the agent x agent outputs "as is," on the logic that, while exaggerative, the resulting agent x agent interactions at least capture the notion of relative strength. However, this option is equally problematic, because the addition of these agent x agent networks amplifies the already exaggerative weight of interactions between individuals. As demonstrated by the bottom figure of right-hand column of figure 2.5, which contains the final weighted agent x agent matrix derived from the simple three-mode holiday network, ignoring the exaggerations inherent to the folding of multi-modal weighted data has a "rich get richer" effect, in which even minor differences in tie strength in the observed data produce drastically different values once transformed into a single agent x agent network.

Fortunately, another means of data transformation, referenced here as additive projection,[36] avoids the distortions inherent to the multiplicative processes that underlie both binary and weighted data folding. Additive projection determines the strength of agents' relationship in a one-mode agent x agent matrix by conducting a pair-wise comparison of the weighted interactions agents share in a two-mode network. The typical implementation of the process is best demonstrated by considering a simple network containing only two agents (Bob and Tom) and two events (Thanksgiving and Christmas). As Figure 2.6 demonstrates, the typical implementation of additive projection produces a directed network in which the strength of the tie from Bob to Tom is valued at 5, and the strength of the tie from Tom to Bob is valued 6. These values were obtained by summing the number of times Bob appeared at the events involving Tom, and vice versa. Thus, additive projection can be formalized as:

Where W_{ij} is the weight between node i and node j in the agent x agent matrix, and k represents the column number of the events on which i and j partnered in the original agent x event matrix, M.[37]

[37] Padrón, et al, present the same equation using alternative notion, p. 715. In his work on scientific collaboration networks, Newman offers a similar method, which weights interactions based on the total number of agents that partner on an event, such that partnerships are weaker when they contain large numbers of participants (e.g. collaborative academic articles involving nearly a dozen authors) and stronger when they contain smaller numbers of participants (e.g. collaborative academic articles involving only two authors). See, M.E.J. Newman, ―Scientific collaboration networks. II. Shortest Paths, weighted networks, and centrality," Physical Review E, Vol. 64 (2001), 016132.

Although this method has applications in the biological sciences—for example, Padrón, et al, use it to determine a directed species x species network based on shared food sources—standard additive projection is less than ideally suited for the analysis of interactions involving individual people. For example, to return to the example summarized in Figure 2.6, it seems illogical to infer that Bob interacted with Tom only twice at Thanksgiving, while Tom interacted with Bob four times.

Additive projection is even more problematic for networks derived from qualitative sources of information, because such sources rarely contain information on the exact period of agents‘ interaction. For example, news coverage of terrorism often states that two individuals participated in the same attack, but given the clandestine nature of such events, it is typically impossible to determine exactly when each terrorist made their individual contribution. Consequently, it is possible for individuals to have participated in the same event at different times, resulting in the sort of absence of interaction between co-participants in events that is familiar to anyone who has ever arrived at a party five minutes after his or her friends left. The left-hand panel of figure 2.7 offers a visual illustration of this ―ships‖ in the night" scenario that expands on the example of Bob and Tom's holiday interactions and demonstrates that it would have been possible for the two men to share no interactions, even though both made multiple appearances at the celebration across five distinct time periods.

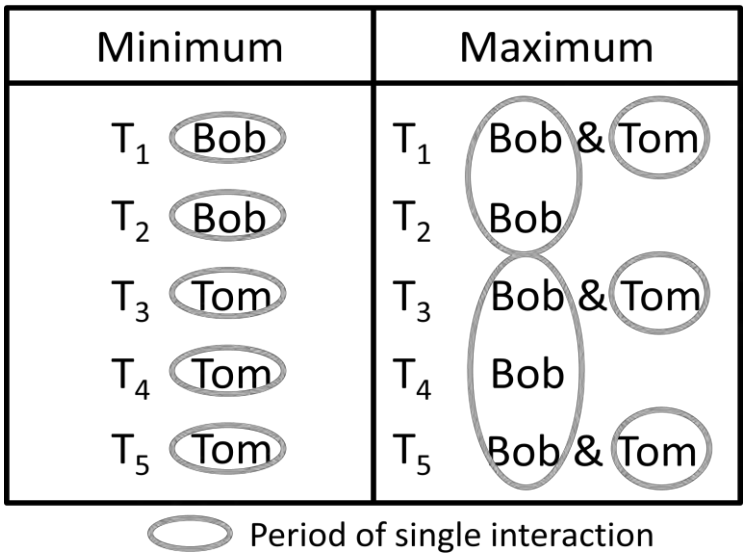
Figure 2.7: Recreating Minimum and Maximum Interactions When the Period of Agents' Interactions is Unknown—Bob and Tom at Thanksgiving



Thus, it seems clear that additive projection requires minor amendment to be of true utility in analyzing the majority of multi-modal data on human relationships, most especially when the data is derived from qualitative sources containing ambiguous information on the timing of interactions. The right-hand panel of figure 2.7 shows that when the period of agents' interactions with events is unknown, the maximum number of interactions between co-participants in an event is equal to the number of ties held by whichever agent has more ties to the event. Put simply, in the absence of additional data that recorded each time-slice as an independent event—data that cannot be created if the original historical record failed to it—then Bob and Tom could not have interacted with each other more than three times at Thanksgiving, regardless of the respective length of their agent x event interactions.

When analysts seeks to examine worst (or best) case scenarios, it may be appropriate to consider these maximum values, but common sense dictates that when two individuals share observed ties to an event, the number of real-world interactions between those agents will fall somewhere between the minimum possible interactions—which is always zero—and the theoretical maximum described above. Because the median between any number and zero can be determined by dividing the original value by two, the average expected interactions between two agents who co-participated in an event can be determined by determining which agent held more ties to the event, and then dividing this value in half. A probabilistic estimate of the total number of agent x agent ties between two individuals in the network can then be obtained by summing these average values across all events in which the pair co-participated. To return to the example in Figure 2.6, this Median-Additive Projection Process (MAPP) would estimate Bob and Tom's relationship at 3.5 interactions (4/2 + 3/2 = 3.5), and, more generally, the process can be formalized as:

$$w_{ij} = \sum_{k:\, m_{ik}\,,\, m_{jk} > 0} \max(m_{ik}\,, m_{jk})/2$$

Thus, agent x agent matrixes derived from MAPP preserve realistic tie weights throughout the transformation from multi-modal to one-mode data. Moreover, MAPP-derived agent x agent matrixes generated from multiple two-mode matrixes can be summed to yield theoretically valid estimations of the total number of ties shared between agents, in lieu of the distorted values obtained by summing binarized or weighted agent x agent networks derived from folding processes. In short, MAPP offers a data transformation process that is well-suited to the study of multi-modal terror networks derived from qualitative data, because the nature of the subject matter and the nature of the source material dictate that it is impossible to reconstruct the exact timing of agents' shared participation in events, shared access to resources, and shared membership in organizations.

Unfortunately, none of the out-of-the-box software packages available for the analysis of network data contain pre-programmed capabilities for additive projection, much less for original user-generated processes like MAPP. It was, therefore, necessary to program new code to generate MAPP-derived agent x agent networks from the multi-modal data. The "R" computer language was used to run a pair-wise MAPP comparison of all relevant two-mode interactions agents shared annually across all relationships types, excluding enmity ties and uncertain ties.[38] For each year in the data, this processing required $N^2 * I$ calculations, where N represents the number of agents in the network, and I represents the number of incidents (shared events, shared resources, and shared organizations) in the data.[39] The resulting weighted agent x agent networks were then summed with annualized hand-coded agent x agent matrixes in order to yield a weighted agent x agent network in which tie strength between actors is equal to the total number of interactions that they most likely shared in a given year.[40]

[38] R Core Team, R: A Language and Environment for Statistical Computing, (Vienna, Austria: R Foundation for Statistical Computing, 2012), ISBN 3-900051-07-0; available online: http://www.R-project.org.
[39] The MAPP transformation allows for self-loops, in which an agent can interact with itself. The value of each agent's self-looped score in the final agent x agent matrix is equal to the total number of ties that agent held to all incidents included in the original multi-modal matrix, i.e. the agent's unnormalized degree in the original matrix.
[40] Because the hand-coded agent x agent networks are not symmetrical ($A \rightarrow B \neq B \rightarrow A$), it is vital to symetrize the hand-coded agent x agent networks by adding, so that the hand-coded link weight between two agents is equivalent to the total number of ties they share ($A \rightarrow B + B \rightarrow A$). If this step is not taken prior to utilizing the hand-coded data

Beyond the mathematics, theory plays a necessary role in the data preprocessing, because MAPPing some two-mode networks will infer interpersonal relationships where none actually exist. For example, if an agent x role network is MAPPed, then all individuals who share the same job-description become linked in the resulting agent x agent network, regardless of whether or not they ever partnered on a specific operation: all of the bomb-makers in al-Qaida, all of the bomb-makers in Jemaah Islamiyah, all of the bomb-makers in Lashkar-e-Toiba, and all of the bomb-makers in every other organization become part of a single clique. Similarly problematic results would be obtained by MAPPing agent x knowledge networks, and because the data is annualized, it would also be inappropriate to MAPP agent x location networks, since there is little reason to assume that someone who visited a city in January had any sort of meaningful interaction with an individual who visited the same city in July. Consequently, agent x role, agent x knowledge, and agent x location networks were excluded from the transformation process and played no role in determining the inferential links that underlie the grouping process.

Similarly, the MAPPing process must be conducted cautiously because events are not of comparable size. It is, for example, reasonable to infer that the dozen attendees of a small Super Bowl party knew each other, but it would be ludicrous to apply the projection technique to the game itself and imply that the tens-of-thousands of ticketholders that attended in person shared any kind of meaningful interpersonal relationship. Therefore, large-scale conflicts, like the Soviet-Afghan War, were excluded from MAPPing as applied to agent x event networks, since it seems exceptionally presumptive to assume that the thousands of mujahideen involved in this event all knew each other. General resources, such as "money" and "forged documents," were excluded on similar grounds from the projection process as applied to the agent x resource networks, and large organizations with national and/or international membership, such as political parties and transnational NGOs, were excluded from the projection process as applied to the agent x organization networks.

However, co-participation in smaller events (e.g. attending the same social events or partnering on the same terror attack of limited scale), access to specific resources (e.g. the Mitsubishi van that Jemaah Islamiyah operatives used as the attack vehicle in the 2002 Bali bombing), and co-membership in smaller local organizations (e.g. co-ownership of businesses) served to infer relationships among the individuals included in the data. Moreover, the exclusions discussed above should not imply that it was impossible for relationships to exist among co-participants in large events, individuals who shared access to general resources, or individuals who co-participated in large non-jihadist organizations. These interactions were merely excluded from the process of inference, so, for example, when the data contained clear evidence of interactions between two participants in the Soviet-Afghan War, such ties were hand coded as agent x agent ties.

Once these projections were accomplished, the data transformation process ended by summing all of the agent x agent networks. The final output of all of this matrix addition was a network well-suited to Newman Grouping and which captures a probabilistic estimate of the weighted relationships that exist between the individuals included in the snowball sample. Given the ambiguities inherent to the subject matter and the uncertainties inherent to any attempt to reconstruct individual relationships using historical records, this estimative network is the most detailed and realistic depiction allowed by the source material.

Because of the complexities involved in the process, it is perhaps best illustrated with a visual example. Consider the sparse agent x agent network depicted in figure 2.8. These ties, which have been restricted to binary values for the sake of simplicity, are very loosely based on real-world data surrounding the 2002 Bali attacks and represent the direct interactions coded by hand from the data. They serve as the baseline to which additional interactions will be added.

Additional information regarding these actors‘ relationships can be obtained by MAPPing some of the two-mode matrixes contained in the data. Figure 2.9 contains sample data, also loosely based on events surrounding the 2002 Bali bombings, that depicts a binary agent x event network involving three events: (1) the 1999-2002 Ambon conflict, a large-scale insurgency in which several JI members participated, (2) a January 2002 planning meeting that several JI members attended in Thailand to discuss the upcoming Bali operation, and (3) the ―Second Wave" of the 9/11 attacks, an aborted airline-hijacking plot which was supposed to make use of South East Asian terrorists who would appear less suspicious to airport security personnel than men of Middle Eastern appearance. As the panels below depict, MAPPing the two-mode data without excluding the Ambon conflict, results in a far more connected graph, by (incorrectly) including all participants in the Ambon conflict in a single dense clique.

Still more applicable data can be obtained by MAPPing an agent x resource network, but this action is subject to the same potential pitfalls as the events data. Including overly general terms, like the generic "explosives" highlighted in red in the matrix depicted in figure 2.10, creates a falsely connected graph. Indeed, Amine Mezbar and Mohd Atlaf had nothing to do with the Jemaah Islamiyah; they respectively operated in Europe and South Asia in 2002 and merely had access to explosives. However, meaningful, accurate relationships can be inferred by including in the folding process specific resources, such as the Mitsubishi van that served as the bomb-truck in the Bali bombings and the Denpassar safehouse where the bomb for that attack was assembled.

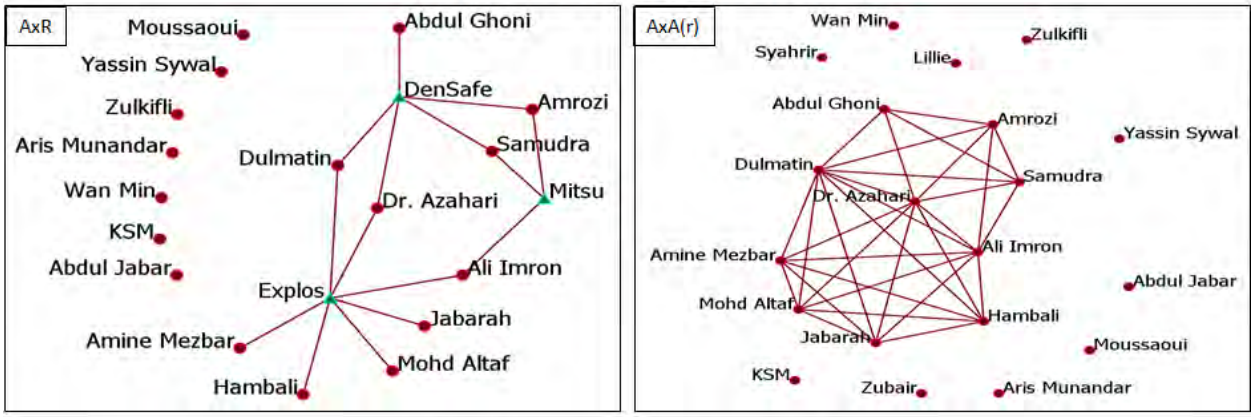
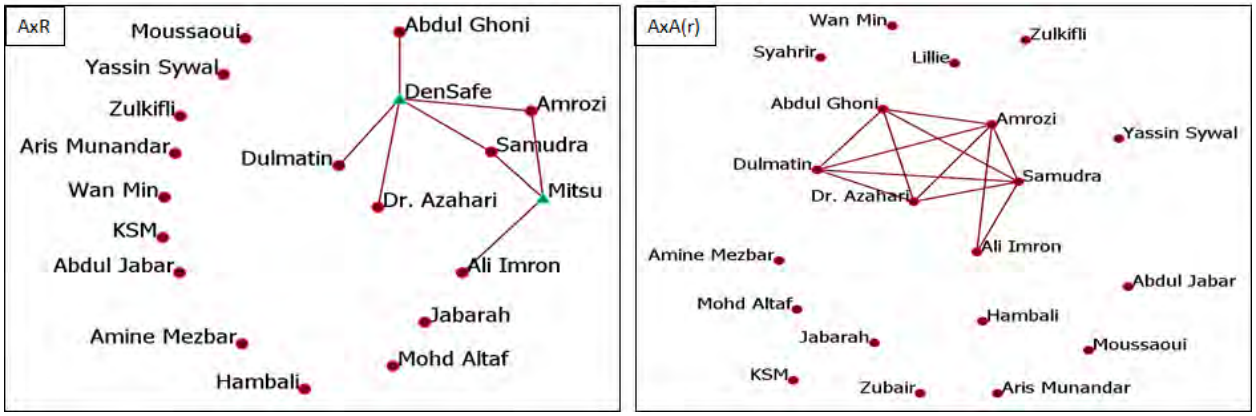
Large Scale Resource Included



Large Scale Resource Excluded



Similar examples could be drawn from agent x organization networks, but the need to restrict the folding process to small events, specific resources, and local organizations is best demonstrated by considering the final networks that result from the example outlined above. Figure 2.11 (below) contains two columns; the top row of each contains an identical copy of the sparse agent x agent network depicted in figure 2.8. The left hand column then contains the agent x agent matrix derived from co-participation in all events, followed by the agent x agent matrix derived from shared access to all resources. The bottom figure in the column represents the sum of the three networks above. The right hand column repeats this same pattern, except that the derived matrixes it presents respectively excluded the Ambon conflict and generic explosives.

Visual inspection of the bottom two graphs is sufficient to conclude that they are remarkably different, but some comparative statistics serve to drive home the point. Because both networks contain identical node sets, it is possible to run a Quadratic Assignment Procedure (QAP) analysis, which is a special type of correlation test specifically designed to deal with the sorts of interdependence between variables that result from overlapping node sets.[41] This analysis produced a p-vale of 0.0000, indicating that the results are statistically significant at the most stringent level of analysis, but found that the two networks were only 69.5 percent correlated. A total of 62 different links would need to be deducted from the bottom left-hand graph in order to make it match its counterpart on the right. And these values stem from the exclusion of only two nodes, namely the Ambon conflict and generic explosives, from a small network of only 20 people. Clearly, determining what to include and exclude from the projection process is a non-trivial decision that greatly impacts the outcome of the analysis.

With the algebraic data transformations accomplished, the analysis returned to the task of grouping and conducted the Newman process. Table 2.1 summarizes the modularity scores of the resulting annual groupings. The left-hand chart presents average scores for all years since al-Qaida's inception in 1988 and 2010; the right-hand chart presents average scores for all years since al-Qaida first actively participated in a terrorist attack in 1993 and 2010. Although both results suggest that Newman groupings found meaningful divisions on average, the worrying low minimum score in the left-hand graph, as well as its lower mean score than the right-hand graph, suggest that the grouping process is not especially well-suited to years in which terror groups are not actively involved in attacks.

Once the groups were determined, the next step was to match the computer-generated groupings to real-world organizations. Fortunately, the terrorism literature, for all its disagreements about the specific boundaries of terror organizations, is generally in consensus regarding organizations' named leaders. Thus, matching the simulated divisions to real-world organizations became a game of "find the emir," and, for example, individuals obtained al-Qaida membership' for a given year by virtue of inclusion in the same Newman group as Usama bin Laden. Figure 2.12 illustrates the process visually in relation to al-Qaida; Newman groups are defined by color, with bin Laden's Newman group depicted in yellow-green. In order to better demonstrate the functionality of the approach, a handful of well-known al-Qaida members have been highlighted with a different node shape and labeled in order to make them more easily distinguishable. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the acknowledged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks; Mohammed Atta, the acknowledged field commander of the 9/11 attacks; and Abu Hafs al-Masry (a.k.a. Mohammed Atef), the alleged military chief of al-Qaida in 2001, all appear in bin Laden's Newman group.

However, it would be foolish to suggest that bin Laden's Newman group offers a comprehensive and unflawed definition of al-Qaida. Imperfections in the data, which are inevitable when working on clandestine subject matter, lead to the underestimation of ties between some individuals. Moreover, the best-hidden terrorists are likely to have escaped mention in the data altogether. The impact of these unavoidable data omissions is clear: bin Laden's Newman group is likely to exclude several important members of al-Qaida.

The nature of the grouping algorithm also problematizes the results, because the Newman method finds hard boundaries between groups. Links can exist between the divisions, but individuals cannot hold membership in multiple groups. This assumption contradicts the accepted wisdom on Islamist terrorism, because many prominent jihadists have held simultaneous membership in more than one terrorist organization. For example, numerous analysts concluded that Hambali, an Indonesian-born Islamist who gained notoriety for his involvement in a series of bombings and plots throughout southeast Asia, belonged to both Jemaah Islamiyah and al-Qaida at the time of his capture in August 2003.[42] Similarly, numerous media outlets alleged that Illyas Kashmiri, a Pakistani militant involved in attacks against Indian targets and assassination attempts on former Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, held membership in a branch of Harkat-ul-Jihad-i-Islami (HUJI) as well as al-Qaida when he was killed by an American missile strike in early June 2011.[43] Such examples demonstrate that the Newman method's inability to allow individuals to hold multiple memberships greatly limits its applicability to contemporary Islamist terrorism.

Finally, structural considerations may also problematize a model of al-Qaida premised on strict Newman groups. A number of analyses suggest that terror groups deliberately organize in formal cells to promote operational security.[44] As depicted in figure 2.13 (below), cellular networks occur when members of each cell are densely connected to each other, in non-overlapping clique-like structures, that have sparse connections to other cells, ideally through a single tie, so that in the event of a cell's compromise, its members can only inform on the same redundant handful of operatives, and not the broader network.[45] Thus, if al-Qaida follows this model, the organization is apt to contain a number of natural divisions, not just a single Newman group centered around bin Laden. Clearly, it is necessary to relax the formally determined boundaries of bin Laden's Newman group in order to produce a meaningful model of al-Qaida.

[44] The military explicitly characterizes terror groups' organization in cellular terms. See: U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command (TRADOC), A Military Guide to Terrorism in the Twenty-First Century, Deputy Chief of Staff for Intelligence (DCSINT) Handbook No. 1, (August 15, 2007), p. 3-1. A number of academics implicitly suggest cellular structure by using the term "cell" to discuss sub-sets of terror groups. However, given the rarity of explicit definitions in the terrorism literature, this implicit characterization may result as much from a vocabulary dispute as a consensus regarding cellular structure. It sometimes seems that "cell" is used as a synonym for "group," rather than as a formal term that references a specific type of organization. For examples of academic literature that includes fairly clear characterizations of Islamist terrorism as a cellularly-organized phenomenon, see: Anthony H. Coredesman and Nawaf Obaid, "Al-Qaeda in Saudi Arabia: Asymmetric Threats and Islamist Extremists," Center for Strategic and International Studies, January 26, 2005; Mette Eilstrup-Sangiovanni and Calvert Jones, "Assessing the Dangers of Illicit Networks," International Security, Vol. 33, No. 2 (Fall 2008), pp. 7-44; Scott Helfstein and Dominick Wright, "Success, Lethality, and Cell Structure Across the Dimensions of Al Qaeda," Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, Vol. 34, No. 5 (2011), pp. 367-382.

Fortunately, a simple additive process addresses many of the issues created by applying the Newman method to data that contains information gaps, real-world membership overlaps, and the strong possibility of cellular networks. By adding all the individuals that share meaningful relationships with members of bin Laden's Newman group to the sample of ~~"al~~-Qaida members," a more expansive model of the terror organization emerges.

The logical underpinning of this process is exceptionally straightforward: because the limitations inherent to the study of terrorism dictate that even the most detailed research will unearth only a portion of the ties that actually exist between Islamists, it is sound to assume that any individual who shares a demonstrable pattern of functional ties to bin Laden's Newman group also shares other meaningful ties to the group that are merely hidden from observation. However, this proposed extension immediately raises two questions: Is the process expansive enough to ensure a reasonably realistic representation of al-Qaida? And, is the process so expansive that it exaggerates al-Qaida's size?

The first question can be partially answered by briefly examining how the additive process mitigates the Newman method's unrealistic assumption of hard organizational boundaries and allows individuals to hold multiple memberships. For example, in 1999, Hambali falls into the same Newman group as Abdullah Sungkar and Abu Bakar Bashir, the named leaders of Jemaah Islamiyah, squarely making him a member of this organization. However, by virtue of Hambali's operational connections to individuals like Walid bin Attash (a.k.a. Khallad), a bin Laden confidant who helped to select the operatives responsible for the 9/11 Attacks,[46] the model also attributes al-Qaida membership to the Indonesian. Because individuals retain their original organizational affiliations alongside the memberships determined through this additive process, the relaxed model allows for a more realistic depiction of organizational overlap.

However, the problems created by cellular structure are only partially addressed by the additive process. If, in the graph below, component A,B,C,D,E represented a Newman group surrounding a terrorist leader, then the additive process would include only node F, leaving the rest of his cell out of the model.

At first blush, this example suggests that the simplest solution is to extend the additive process by another step, by including all those within two steps of the original Newman group. However, the theory of ―six degrees of separation" highlights the dangers of this approach.

This theory, popularized by a stage play and later a film of the same name, states that all currently living people are separated by no more than six intervening connections.[47] Ultimately, the idea found its best-known representation in ―The Kevin Bacon Game," in which players attempt to connect actors to the Hollywood legend in as few steps as possible by using shared appearances in films as links.[48] For example, Tom Hanks has a Bacon-distance of one because he starred alongside the game's namesake in Ron Howard's Apollo 13. Comedian Dan Aykroyd has a Bacon-distance of two, because Aykryod co-starred in The Blues Brothers alongside John Belushi, who also starred in Animal House, in which a very young Kevin Bacon played a small supporting role.

[47] Albert-Laszlo Barabasi provides a superb non-technical overview of the concept in Linked: How Everything is Connected to Everything Else and What It Means for Business, Science, and Everyday Life, (New York: Plume, 2003), pp. 25-40; See also, Duncan J. Watts Six Degrees: The Science of a Connected Age, (New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2003), pp. 69-100.

[48] A number of websites are dedicated to this game, most prominently ―The Oracle of Bacon" (http://oracleofbacon.org/) and ―The Kevin Bacon Game" (http://www.thekevinbacongame.com/).

At an intuitive level, it is fairly easy to see that when links are extended beyond a distance of one, the implied relationships are often meaningless, even when the participants work in a confined and specialized field, such as the film industry or Islamist terrorism. Just as there is no evidence to support a substantive working relationship between Bacon and Aykryod, there is no guarantee that al-Qaida members have meaningful ties with the associates of associates. The cliques depicted above might be part of a single organization that adopted a cellular structure, or they might be two distinct groups that share a single, one-off operational tie. Without information that provides additional context, it is impossible to tell. If the model were to automatically include such nodes in its definition of al-Qaida by extending the additive process to include actors two steps removed from the core Newman group, the risk of conflating the organization with the broader Islamist terror movement would increase exponentially.

A better solution to the dilemma created by cellular structure involves the use of multiple Newman groups. Although terror groups typically have a single acknowledge emir, he is rarely the only leader in the organization. For example, Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian physician turned jihadist, was acknowledged as bin Laden‘s number two from the time of Egyptian Islamic Jihad‘s formal merger with al-Qaida in 2001 until the dissident Saudi‘s death in 2011. These sorts of secondary leaders often fall within the named emir's Newman group, but when they do not, these secondary leaders offer additional starting points from which to construct broader models that take cellular structure into consideration when estimating membership in Islamist groups.

However, there is a trade-off. This process brings additional subjectivity into the model, because it is not always entirely clear who serves as an important secondary leader in a given organization. Consequently, it is incredibly important to use as additional starting points only those secondary leaders for whom an overwhelming consensus exists regarding their role in the terrorist organization under study, lest the model create overly expansive groups. In combination with the preceding characterization of individuals who held simultaneous membership in more than one organization, this characterization suggests that a one-step extension of Newman grouping is necessary to ensure realistic modeling, but this accommodation insufficiently addresses the issue of cellular structure when conducted absent multiple, carefully-selected starting points.

But what about false positives? The primary danger of extending Newman groups is that the process labels individuals who only hold passing acquaintance with an organization as members of it. In order to address issues of over-expansiveness, this analysis turned to theory and limited the extension process based on link type. Although the original Newman grouping considers all types of relationships in an attempt to model the complexities of organizational membership, the additive process included only the functional ties defined in the previous chapter. The examples outlined below make clear that other types of relationships, such as family ties, ideological affiliations, and training links serve as insufficient criteria for inclusion in the estimate of group membership when considered in isolation. Their use outside of the Newman model's complex consideration of multiple intersecting ties would create an overly broad characterization of Islamist terror organizations.

There is some strong evidence that members of the same family often become involved in terrorism. Perhaps most famously, the 2002 Bali bombings, which killed more than 200 nightclub patrons at the popular Indonesian beach retreat, were largely the work of three Indonesian brothers: Ali Ghufron (a.k.a. Mukhlas), Ali Imron, and Amrozi.[49] However, there is also ample evidence showing that family ties alone are insufficient to brand people as members of a terrorist organization. For example, bin Laden's eldest half-sibling (the dissident Saudi had no full siblings), Salem, lived a flamboyant life that directly opposed Usama's dour fundamentalism. Salem enjoyed champagne, fine food, women, and nightlife. He was even known to bribe his way onto barroom stages in order to indulge a passion for karaoke.[50] Similarly, the father of Umar Farouk Abdulmutalab—a Nigerian national who gained dubious renown as the "underwear bomber" in December 2009, when he attempted to down an American-flagged jetliner by detonating explosives hidden beneath his pants—was so opposed to Islamist terrorism that he visited an American Embassy in the hopes of convincing the State Department that his son posed a threat that required close monitoring.[51] If al-Qaida-linked families follow the pattern evident in the 2002 Bali attacks, rather than the patterns evidenced by Salem bin Laden or the senior Abdulmutalab, then their members will find their way into the sample by means of operational and financial ties to the core Newman group, rather than via kinship. Assuming that family ties guarantee membership in terrorist organizations would grant these groups unnatural size, because brothers are not necessarily brothers-in-arms.

When viewed in isolation, ideological connections play a similarly problematic role, since many individuals who developed an affinity for al-Qaida's extremist ideology never had any actual contact with members of the organization. Michael C. Finton, who is currently incarcerated for plotting to bomb government buildings in Springfield, IL, offers a useful illustration. In 2006, he demonstrated his fealty to bin Laden's ideals by swearing an oath of allegiance to a man he believed to be both his mentor in jihadism and an al-Qaida member, but who was actually an undercover federal agent. A couple of months later, Finton's loyalty was seemingly rewarded, when the same mentor handed him a remote-control detonator and the keys to what appeared to be a bomb-laden van—a vehicle that was actually filled with inert material. After parking the van next to a federal building, Finton repeatedly tried in vain to ignite the "bomb" and was promptly arrested for his attempts toward terrorism. Finton clearly desired to become a part of al-Qaida, but it would be dishonest to claim that he had any substantive connection to bin Laden's organization, since Finton's plot at no time involved even a single member of the organization.[52] Attributing such events to al-Qaida, or labeling individuals like Finton as "al-Qaida members" based on their affinity for extremism, creates a pointless tautology, in which it becomes impossible to disprove any violent jihadists' membership in al-Qaida, because participation in Islamist-motivated violence is the very metric used to determine membership. Indeed, as Clive Williams noted in his discussion of relationships among Islamist terrorists, it would be difficult to find any act of Sunni-motivated Islamist jihad that did not have at least a partial ideological overlap with al-Qaida's worldview.[53]

Aside from ideology, no interaction provides as much confusion about al-Qaida membership as training. The problem stems from the failure to distinguish between those trained by al-Qaida and those who attain true membership in the organization. According to the sworn testimony of former al-Qaida members, only the top-tier of graduates from bin Laden-affiliated training centers, such as Khaldun and Farouq camps, were admitted into the organization.[54] The remaining individuals were largely excluded from al-Qaida's operational network; most returned to their home countries and joined (or returned to) other less selective organizations.[55] Others founded new independent organizations,[56] and still more trainees undertook attacks absent any financial or logistical support from established terror groups.[57] While al-Qaida's standards of admittance likely declined as the pace of counterterrorism initiatives eliminated key members of the organization, and although practical participation in al-Qaida attacks remains a far more relevant metric for assessing organizational affiliation than formal membership rites, there is little reason to assume that every individual trained by al-Qaida became a member of the organization.

[55] Dulmatin, an Indonesian who gained dubious renown for his involvement in a host of JI-linked attacks, including the 2002 Bali bombings, offers a useful illustration. In 1989 and 1990, he trained at Sada Camp under Abdul Rasool Sayyaf, a close confidant of bin Laden's who was so well-regarded among Islamists that a Filipino jihadist group later named itself in his honor. Despite this training, Dulmatin lacked any demonstrable financial or operational involvement with al-Qaida until ten years later, when he found himself on the al-Qaida's fringes owing to his participation in the 2000 Christmas Eve bombings that Hambali, who held dual membership in al-Qaida and JI, directed and which JI conducted at bin Laden's behest. For information on Dulmatin's training in South Asian and participation in the Christmas Eve Bombings, see: International Crisis Group, "Jemaah Islamiyah in South East Asia: Damaged But Still Dangerous," ICG Asia Report No. 63, August 26, 2003. (Hereafter "Damaged But Still Dangerous"). For information on Abdul Rasool Sayyaf's relationship with bin Laden, see Steve Coll, Ghost Wars: The Secret History of the CIA, Afghanistan, and bin Laden, From the Soviet Invasion to September 10, 2001, (New York: Penguin, 2004).

[56] For example, Aburajak Janjalani trained under Abdul Rasooy Sayyaf between 1988 and 1990, before returning to the Philippines and founding the Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG), a radical Islamist organization that Janjalani named in honor of his mentor. For information on Janjalani's training, see: Damaged but Still Dangerous. For information on the founding of ASG and the etymology of the organization's name, see: Robert H. Reid, "Government says Abu Sayyaf links extend through Afghanistan to Middle East," Associated Press Worldstream, April 9, 1995.

[57] For example, Atta-ur Rahman and Shahzad Bajwa, two Pakistani militants arrested for a string of attacks conducted in Pakistan, trained in an al-Qaida linked camp in Waziristan in 2003. Rahman and Bajwa then went-on to conduct a string of attacks—many of them botched—in and around Karachi. Although the men claimed to operate under the organizational name of "Jundallah," this group never had more than half a dozen members, and seems to have received no operational or financial support from al-Qaida after Rahman and Bajwa left training. See: "Indictment of Jundullah men deferred till Oct. 6 in six terrorism cases," Pakistan Newswire, September 28, 2004; "ATC hears ranger mobile attack case," Pakistan Newswire, June 2, 2005; "Arrested Pakistani militants reveal plan of attacking US consulate, other target," BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, July 20, 2004; Paul Haven, "AP: Arrests damage al-Qaida network," Associated Press Online, August 6, 2004.

Indeed, it is fairly standard practice for organizations operating in a host of occupational fields to train outsiders. For example, the United States Army War College, an institution dedicated to training high-level officers to become strategic thinkers, educates a host of foreign military officers alongside the college's American students. These international fellows remain part of their home governments' armed forces and never become members of the U.S. Army. There are few reasons to assume that terror groups operate according to a fundamentally different logic. Ultimately, training ties are insufficient to use in the extension of Newman groups because terror groups have no control over the actions of non-members once they leave training.

Finally, financial ties merit some specific discussion because of the context of this analysis. Although broad funding patterns are remarkably important to the function of terror groups, these patterns are not the explicit focus of this analysis. Its events-oriented approach precludes it from assessing any money streams that augment terror groups' general operating budgets, such as those that flowed between Benevolence International Foundation, a crooked charity based in suburban Chicago, and al-Qaida.[58] Instead, the financial ties included in the membership modeling process, and more generally in the network data sample, pertain to specific events. Consequently, the membership judgments that the model makes may place a handful of important funders outside of terror groups. Given that intuitive judgments of group membership often draw distinctions between members of the organizations and "linked" funders,[59] this pattern does not represent a deviation from accepted notions of membership, [58] USA v. Enaam M. Arnaout, Plea Agreement (No. 02 CR 892), United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, February 11, 2003.

[59] For example, the terrorist sanctions list maintained by the United Nations security council characterizes Abd al Hamid Sulaiman Muhammad al-Mujil, the former executive director of the Saudi-based International Islamic Relief Organization (IIRO), as a funder of both al-Qaida and the Abu Sayyaf Group, rather than a member of either organization. The narrative summary that explains the reasons for his sanctioning state: "He provided donor funds directly to Al-Qaida and has been identified as a major fundraiser for the Abu Sayyaf Group. . . . Al-Mujil traveled though, given the importance of money to all organizations, there is a sound logic for reconsidering the distinction between linked funders and members in subsequent analyses.

Figure 2.15 provides a visual illustration of the results obtained by extending the Newman groups according to the restrictions outlined above. Given the complexities of the data representation, this image emphasizes only two of the organizations included in the larger analysis: al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah. The image is colored by Newman grouping; the original group surrounding bin Laden is depicted in yellow-green, and the Newman group surrounding Abu Bakar Ba'asyir, who served as JI's emir in 2001, is kelly-green. (Users of the visualization software have no control over the output's color scheme, so it was not possible to choose more contrasting colors). The triangles represent all individuals deemed to be al-Qaida members by the final modeling process; the squares represent all individuals deemed to be outside of al-Qaida by the final modeling process. Transparent nodes represent all individuals deemed to be JI members, and opaque nodes represent all individuals deemed to be outside JI.

Thus, the final modeling process' estimation of al-Qaida includes the following six types of nodes included in the image above:

1. Opaque yellow-green triangles: all those individuals who were part of bin Laden's original Newman group, but who were not modeled as part of JI. Mohammed Atta, the acknowledged field commander of the 9/11 hijackers,[60] offers an example.

2. Transparent yellow-green triangles: all those individuals who were part of bin Laden's original Newman group, but who obtained JI membership via the extension process. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who interacted extensively with bin Laden's immediate supporters and South East Asian terrorists like Hambali offers an example.[61] However, as bin Laden also offers an example, because he shared functional ties with Hambali and other JI members in 2001, it is important to note that extensions are reciprocal[62] and interstitial individuals can obtain memberships that are non-intuitive. Interpretation of these designations is largely a matter of perspective; individuals who hold strong subjectively-determined views on the subject of membership in terror groups are more likely to see such designations as errors, while structurally-minded researchers are more likely to argue that such designations unveil meaningful hidden patterns.

3. Opaque triangles that are not yellow-green: all those individuals who were added to al-Qaida via the extension process, but are not modeled as members of JI. Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who played a prominent role in the 1998 embassy bombings, and who in 2001 returned to East Africa at bin Laden's behest to prepare for the 2002 Mombasa bombings,[63] offers one example. Abdul Rahman Jabrah, a Kuwaiti-Canadian who participated in the 2003 bombing of residential compounds housing Westerners in Riyadh, offers another example.[64]

4. Opaque squares of any color: all those individuals who were excluded from both al-Qaida and JI. Examples include the red squares to the right of Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, which represent the local support team, comprised primarily of first-time jihadists with no prior ties to terror groups, that Fazul had begun to assemble along the Kenyan coast by 2001.[65]

5. Transparent squares of kelly-green: all those individuals modeled as members of JI because they held membership in the Newman group of Abu Bakar Ba'asyir, who served as JI's emir in 2001.[66] Members of this group were not modeled as members of al-Qaida.

[62] This reciprocity is an artifact of the data. Ties are undirected (A→B=B→A), because the nature of the data precludes more finite determinations, as does the folding process used to infer agent x agent ties based on shared ties in two-mode networks.

6. Transparent triangles of kelly-green: All those individuals modeled as JI members because they held membership in the Ba'asyir's Newman group, and who were also modeled as members of al-Qaida via the extension process. Examples include Hambali, whose close relationship with al-Qaida is well-documented,[69] and Imam Samudra, who was heavily involved in the planning and orchestration of the 2000 bombings of Christian churches across Indonesia, an operation that, according to the sworn testimony of one of Samudra's many co-conspirators, was conducted at bin Laden's behest.[70]

While the image described above demonstrates much of the complexity inherent to attempts at formal modeling of clandestine organizations, it is important to note that the graphic offers only a single snap-shot that describes membership as modeled in 2001, rather than a comprehensive assessment of membership patterns over time. Since the data is annualized, the modeling process was conducted independently for every year in the data. Two useful analytical distinctions emerged from this approach.

First, each agent modeled as part of an organization has a clear "start date" that marks the beginning of his tenure in a terrorist group. In theory, this design should mitigate the sorts of conflation problems inherent to temporally flat models, which pose significant risks of false attribution by granting organizations credit (or blame) for attacks conducted by members before they joined the organization. For example, by considering the impact of time, the model should avoid attributing culpability for the 2002 abduction and murder of American diplomat Lawrence

Foley to al-Qaida based on the participation of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi,[71] because these events occurred before Zarqawi formed meaningful operational ties with bin Laden or his closest followers.[72] However, as discussed in greater detail in the section on testing the model, its timing distinctions have a somewhat fuzzy quality as a result of both terrorism's clandestine nature and this study's reliance on publically available data.

Second, many agents modeled as members of terror groups have clear "end dates" that mark their separation from an organization. This design choice theoretically enables the analysis to avoid falsely attributing attacks to individuals who broke with their parent organization, as the founders of Jemaah Islamiyah did in the early 1990s, when a leadership dispute within the decades-old Darul Islam movement caused several its more radical members to walk-out and form their own new organization.[73] However, the same issues alluded to in the previous paragraph make these determinations equally as hazy as the start dates. Longitudinally modeling the data ultimately did as much to highlight the ambiguities inherent to determining membership in terror groups as it did to resolve them.

Table 2.2 lists the 33 organizations that emerged in the data via the modeling process outlined above. Groups were determined to be merged when one organization subsumed the other in the final modeling process, or, in more formal notation, when Group A $\subseteq$ Group B. In the interests of total clarity, it is also important to specify that the term "organization" as used in the chart below is interchangeable with "extended Newman group." Consequently, the organizations listed below differ greatly in their capabilities and durability, but they all represent meaningful divisions in the data. Naming was a somewhat subjective process, especially considering that many recognized terror groups change their name over time,[74] but every effort was made to reference organizations by the names which are commonly used to describe them.

[75] Although Saudi Hizballah is a Shiite group, this analysis modeled the organization in order to assess the possibility of al-Qaida's involvement in the 1996 Khobar Towers bombings, an attack in which some observers still claim that bin Laden's organization played an unspecified role. For example, former U.S. Secretary of Defense William Perry stated in a 2007 interview that he believed al-Qaida was the driving force behind the Khobar bombing. See: "Perry: U.S. eyed Iran attack after bombing," United Press International, June 6, 2007.

Because the analysis focuses on terrorism against civilian targets, the list of modeled organizations excludes Iraqi insurgent groups, the Afghan Taliban, Algeria's Armed Islamic Group (GIA), and other similar organizations primarily engaged in force-on-force conflicts against state militaries and international military coalitions. However, the lines between insurgency and terrorism are rarely crystal clear, so it would be irresponsible for the analysis to exclude such organizations entirely. Consequently, the data contains partial information, taken at face value from the source material, on seven insurgent groups. Table 2.3 (below) lists these organizations:

Table 2.3: Un-modeled Insurgencies Included in the Data

Al-Qaida in Iraq	(AQI)	Free Aceh Movement	(GAM)	Lashkar-e-Jahangvi	(LeJ)
				Moro Islamic Liberation Front	(MILF)

Similarly, some terror groups exist on the edges of the global Sunni jihadist movement; they cooperate with al-Qaida and other groups in a limited capacity, but do not share their ideology or goals. Therefore, the data also contains partial information on two such organizations, namely HAMAS and Lebanese Hizballah, but as with the insurgent groups, the analysis does not formally model these organizations because they lie outside of this inquiry's stated focus. Although the individuals highlighted in figure 2.17 provide one illustration of the model's performance, broader testing is required in order to fully understand its applicability to the study of terror.

2.3 PROOF OF CONCEPT

Unfortunately, the same issues that necessitate the use of a formal grouping model make fully testing its accuracy impossible: The available information on individual jihadists is inconsistent in both quantity and detail; theoretical disagreements about how and where to bound organizations cause widely divergent estimates of groups‘ membership, and some jihadists deliberately exaggerate their organizational affiliations, while others attempt to obscure such ties in the name of operational security. The organizational affiliations that the vast majority of individuals involved in terrorism hold in the real world simply are not known. Therefore, the most this analysis can do is to offer proof of concept by comparing the results of the grouping process to well-regarded expert judgments.

Several features of the United Nations‘ terror sanctioning list make this resource a reasonable benchmark against which to compare. First, a series of ―narrative summaries of reasons for listing” accompany the UN designations, making it easy to see why an individual was sanctioned, as well as to understand the nature of his relationship to known terror groups.[76] Second, the list draws on pools of data collected by the international intelligence community, and although this access is indirect, the list‘s judgments are supported by information unavailable to the general public. Therefore, the list can be regarded as a high-quality source, and comparisons against it serve as a rigorous test of both the grouping process and the underlying open-source data. Finally, from a purely methodological standpoint, this study deliberately excluded the list from the snowball sampling process, to enable a blind comparison between the list‘s designations and the results of the Newman-based grouping process.

[76] These summaries are available online: http://www.un.org/sc/committees/1267/individuals_associated_with_Al-Qaida.shtml.

However, the UN list is far from flawless. It does not aim to be comprehensive and, therefore, provides information on only a small percentage of the world's jihadists. Moreover, the nomination process that underlies the list is somewhat schizophrenic; because any of the UN's member states can add to the list, it does not represent a single unified consensus regarding the definition of terrorism or the boundaries of organizations.[77] Indeed, the extent and nature of countries' contributions to the list vary greatly. Italy, for example, seems to forward the name of every individual that the country convicts on terrorism charges, no matter how minor. Indonesia, by contrast, seems somewhat more lax, as the names of prominent jihadists like Noordin Mohd Top, who was regarded as South East Asia's most dangerous terrorist until his death in 2009,[78] are not mentioned in the UN sanctions documents. It remains unclear why the list highlights some of the violent Islamist movement's bit players, while excluding some of its stars.

Similarly, although the UN documents provide a superb reference for anyone interested in studying terrorism at the individual level, the depth of the narratives is limited. They discuss only selective aspects of the listee's involvement in terrorism, and, as evidenced by the fact that the narrative on bin Laden does not reference his death, the summaries are not updated to include events that transpire after the listee's initial inclusion. Consequently, much of the membership data embedded in the narrative summaries has a static feel, and it is often impossible to determine precisely when someone joined a terrorist organization. Because the list cannot entirely overcome the ambiguities inherent to terrorism as subject matter, despite benefitting from additional information not available to the general public, the size of the useable sample that can be derived from the list is significantly smaller than the list's overall size.

Of the 254 individuals the United Nations has sanctioned as Islamist terrorists, 79 are unambiguously described in time-specific terms as members of the terror organizations that the Newman-based grouping process attempted to model. The narrative summaries list specific membership start-dates for many; for example, the documents state: "Sheikh Ahmed Salim Swedan was recruited to join Al-Qaida in 1996 by Mohammed Saddiq Odeh in Mombasa, Kenya."[79] In the remaining cases, it was possible to infer a start-date with reasonable reliability based on the context of the narrative summary; for example, given that al-Qaida was founded in 1988,[80] it is possible to infer that Aly Soliman Massoud Abdul Sayed became a member of that organization around 1988, because the supporting UN narrative states that he "has been a member of Al-Qaida since the 1980s and joined Al-Qaida's military committee in the 1990s."[81]

The results of these qualitative judgments were then compared to the Newman-based grouping process' characterization of the same 79 individuals. This evaluation provides a reasonable estimate of the process' propensity for false negatives, but the nature of the subject matter makes the equally thorny possibility of false positives impossible to assess with any reliability. The data summarized by table 2.4 demonstrates that the grouping process placed individuals in the same organization as the UN's expert judgments over 78 percent of the time.

However, 3 of the 17 errors (17.65 percent) result from data omissions and are thus better attributed to the snowball sampling method than the grouping process. Given that all of the individuals omitted from the sample are either minor terrorists or individuals who operate in parts of the world where open-source coverage is particularly opaque, these results generally speak to the reliability of the data acquisition process. Indeed, as the characterizations below show, the UN was able to tie only one of the three omitted individuals to a specific attack, despite the organization's superior access to information.

- Zaki Ezat Zaki Ahmed, who the UN narratives describe as a member of EIJ and al-Qaida wanted for crimes against Egypt. His name is not mentioned in reference to any specific events or locations.[82]

- Al Sayyid Ahmed Fathi Hussein Eliwah, who the UN narratives also describe as a member of EIJ and al-Qaida wanted for crimes against Egypt. As with Ahmed, Eliwah's name is not referenced in relation to specific events, though the UN documents do state that he trained in Afghanistan in the early 1990s.[83] documents, Nail participated in an attack on a Mauritanian military base in 2005, as well as several kidnappings, and assorted profit-generating crimes.[84]

Data questions aside, placing individuals in the correct organization is only half of the battle; it is equally important to determine when they joined a terror group. Comparing the first year that the Newman-based process attributed group membership to individuals with the time-specific membership data obtained from the UN narratives offers a more detailed test of the model's performance. Table 2.5, which compares membership statistics at the organizational level and across time, demonstrates that the modeling process performed well across a host of organizations by reliably placing individuals in the appropriate group, but also shows that the timing of these comparisons is sometimes problematic. In order to highlight the grouping process to the greatest extent possible, the results do not include the five individuals omitted from the snowball sample.

However, much ambiguity surrounds these results. Given that the sample represented in figure 2.20 contained exceptionally sparse data on several of the included organizations, it is difficult to assume that the results are generalizable beyond al-Qaida, Jemaah Islamiyah, and perhaps also al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula. Within these organizations, false negatives were not an especially prominent problem; instead, attributions that took place four or more years removed from the UN characterization constituted the most worrisome issue. It remains unclear if these timing discrepancies stem from inconsistencies in the grouping process, from coverage issues stemming from the snowball data sampling process, from data omissions that are inherent to all open-source inquiries into terrorism (regardless of method), or, as is most likely, from some combination of these factors. Similarly, because reality remains unknown, it is not clear that the UN narratives' judgments are especially accurate. It is at least theoretically possible that the modeled membership estimates are more accurate, or that both characterizations are entirely wrong. Ultimately, ambiguity reigns supreme in all large-scale efforts to determine the precise nature and timing of individuals' membership in terror groups, but these results demonstrate broad congruence between the model's output and expert judgments.

Given this unavoidable uncertainty and the timing inconsistencies between the model and the UN narratives, this study's subsequent analyses treat membership designations in a somewhat soft manner. While it remains possible for individuals to sever connections and leave terror groups, gaps in involvement need to be fairly pronounced in order for determinations of severance to be valid. The analysis considers any actions that an individual takes within a year of the model's characterization of his departure from an organization as still attributable to this parent organization.

Why one year and not two, three, or four? The choice is ultimately subjective, but evidence suggests that hit squads typically arrive in the country to be attacked sometime within the calendar year prior to conducting an attack. For example, open-sources place Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, an African terrorist who played a principle role in the 2002 Mombasa attacks that targeted an airliner and a hotel popular with Israeli tourists,[85] in Somalia conducting terror training as late as the autumn of 2001, suggesting that he did not begin his in-country preparations for the Kenyan attack until sometime in early 2002.[86] Similarly, Mohamed Atta, the acknowledged field commander of the 9/11 hijackers during their stay in the U.S. ahead of the 2001 attacks, arrived in America in the summer of 2000.[87] Thus, one year seems a large enough relaxation to encompass real-world interactions, while remaining small enough so as not to effectively render static the model's characterization of membership.

This final determination serves as an example of a broader pattern that this chapter has tried to highlight, namely that the Newman grouping process is not a purely deterministic approach to assigning individuals to terror groups. Human analysts must be in the loop at several phases between the collection of raw data and the final output. Therefore, as figure 2.16 summarizes visually, the process outlined by this chapter is semi-automated and combines the rigors of mechanistic formal modeling with determinations drawn from the theoretical literature on terrorism.

3.0 ESTIMATING AL-QAIDA'S ROLE IN TERRORISM WITHIN THE BALEIAN TYPOLOGY

As the first chapter argued, most efforts to categorize terrorism have been overly theoretical in nature. Authors have devoted considerable effort to creating typologies that describe the breadth of al-Qaida's involvement in Islamist terror, but have done little in the way of wide implementation. Consequently, the relative frequency of al-Qaida's various patterns of involvement in terrorism remains unclear.

This chapter constitutes one effort toward this necessary broad-based empirical work, and discusses how network methodology is applied to the snowball data sample in an attempt to fill-in the Baleian typology outlined in the first chapter's literature review. Toward those ends, the chapter contains seven sections following this introduction. The first describes how this study generates a continuous variable that estimates the extent of organizations' involvement in terrorist events using a novel implementation of a formal measure known as degree centrality. The second section revisits the distinction between strong and weak ties and explicitly defines how and why this study differentiates between the two, before the third section turns its attention towards questions of geography and explicitly defines "the West" as a region, in order to enable the differentiation between events that are merely strongly tied to al-Qaida and those conducted by hit squads deployed to the West. The fourth section considers time and examines the conditions that must be met in order for this study to determine that an individual made a clear break with al-Qaida, which in turn makes it possible to distinguish between events conducted by the organization's active members and events conducted by its former members. The fifth section discusses ideology and explains the conditions that must be met for this study to consider an event as ideologically-linked to al-Qaida. The sixth section briefly considers events that have no ties to al-Qaida, before the seventh section presents the relative frequency of the Baleian categories and discusses broad trends within each of them. Because the quantitative estimates presented by this chapter say little about variation within each of the categories, the trends outlined in the seventh section also serve as a metric to select the cases discussed in this study's remaining chapters.

3.1 IMPLEMENTING NETWORK MEASURES IN THE ASSESSMENT OF TERROR THREATS

Among the membership model's more useful implementations is the ability to estimate the extent and nature of organizations' involvement (or lack thereof) in terror incidents. This section outlines a measurement process that uses network tools to make replicable, non-subjective assessments of tie strength. Because functional links, as defined by the first chapter, constitute the most meaningful form of involvement in an attack, the process outlined below is applied to this relationship type in order to estimate the extent of al-Qaida's culpability for Islamist-motivated plots and attacks conducted between 1993, when the organization first played a demonstrable functional role in an attack, and 2010, the last year included in this assessment.

The process hinges on a formal network measure known as degree centrality. As typically implemented in a single-mode network, degree determines agents' importance based on the number of links they hold; the more links an agent has, the greater their centrality. Consequently, this measure provides a superb measure of direct influence in a network, because agents have the greatest capacity to influence the individuals with which they share immediate relationships.[1]

However, the process of estimating functional organizational involvement in events is slightly more complex, because this technique involves implementing degree in a two-mode network that depicts agents and events, and which also scales actor's involvement by counting the total number of links he or she holds to an event over time. For any event in the data, it then becomes possible to express agents' role in the event as a ratio, by dividing the number of links an agent holds to the event over time—the agent's cumulative degree—by the total number of ties that all agents hold to the event over time. So, for example, if an agent "A" held 5 ties to an event, agent "B" held 3 ties to the same event, and all agents in the network held a combined total of 20 ties to that event, then the A's share of involvement would be 25 percent, and B's share of involvement would be 15 percent. Because percentages are additive, moving from the individual level to the organizational level then becomes a simple matter of arithmetic. To complete the example above, if the membership model classified A and B as members of the same organization, and no other members of their group held ties to the event under analysis, then the organization's share of involvement in the event would be 40 percent.

The only real trick of the process comes in dealing with individuals that hold multiple memberships. Because there is no a-priori reason to assume that dual members operated exclusively in the interests of one organization over another, the problem is easily resolved through simple division. If, for example, agent A held membership in both al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah, then the model would credit each organization with half of his share of involvement in the attack.

The primary advantage of this approach is its replicability, which mitigates the subjectivity inherent to qualitative determinations of the extent of al-Qaida's involvement in events. However, this advantage does not come without cost. Specifically, the method requires that the data contains substantial quantities of information on a given event in order to classify that event reliably. When this requirement is not met, small changes in the data cause disproportionate swings in the model's output.

Al-Qaida's involvement in the 2003 plot to attack Reunion Island, a French possession located in off of Africa's east coast in the Indian Ocean, offers a useful illustration. In April 2003, French police arrested Christian Ganczarski, a Polish-born German citizen who converted to Islam before training in bin Laden-funded Afghan camps and joining al-Qaida.[2] Based on the testimony of other terror suspects, French authorities accused Ganczarski of being ~~"o~~ne of the organizers and the financier" of a plot to bomb the French island using a ~~"b~~ooby-trapped car."[3] While his affiliation with al-Qaida clearly grants the organization some measure of culpability for the plot, data paucity may exaggerate that scale of this involvement, because the snowball sample contains only three interactions that relate directly to the Reunion Island operation. As two of these links belong to Ganczarski, the model estimates al-Qaida's involvement in the event at 66.67 percent. However, if all other variables were held constant and a single interaction was added that did not involve a member of bin Laden's organization, then al-Qaida's estimated involvement in the Reunion plot would drop to 50 percent. This sensitivity dictates that the model's estimates must be interpreted with a grain of salt for events that contain few known interactions.

[3] "French detain Tunisian terror suspect," AP Online, June 11, 2003.

However, it is worth noting that this weakness is not unique to this approach. Whether inquiries are quantitative or qualitative in nature, all attempts to study events about which little is known are remarkably sensitive to the revelation of new information. The mathematical nature of this approach may, therefore, ultimately be an advantage, because this method makes the scale of its sensitivity transparent in ways that purely narrative approaches cannot. Toward this transparency, Appendix G, which contains quantitative estimates of organizations‘ functional involvement in all terror events included in this analysis, lists the number of interactions specific to each event, so that readers can easily assess the reliability of each estimate.

Figure 3.1 offers a visualization of the output obtained from this estimation process and summarizes the extent of al-Qaida‘s functional involvement in 129 plots and attacks, which were drawn from the larger snowball sample, and in which bin Laden‘s organization played some functional role. The upper two charts depict this involvement in a static perspective that ranks results by score and provides a sense of overall patterns. The left-hand graph is a simple histogram, in which each line represents a plot or attack, and the right-hand graph shows the same information as a count of events by quartile. The lower two graphs repeat this format, but depict the information in an over-time perspective.

3.2 FROM THE CONTINUOUS TO THE CATEGORICAL: DEFINING STRONG AND WEAK TIES

With the values and limitations of the estimates listed in figure 3.1 in mind, it is necessary to revisit lingering questions regarding the relative values of strong and weak ties. The statistical literature makes it clear that there is not an ideal means to divide continuous measurements into categorical variables. When used in outcome-oriented studies, such as those that tie the efficacy of medical treatment to body mass index or age, cut-points can be determined empirically by finding the group that has —the most significant relation with the outcome," but when determinations are made based on data alone, as they must be here because this analysis takes place outside the context of regression, categories are by definition arbitrary.[4]

This unavoidable fact raises some specific concerns that must be explicitly addressed. Statisticians often question the legitimacy of arbitrary categorizations, because binning continuous variables mitigates the explanatory power of statistical regression by reducing the range of variation among observations.[5] However, as this analysis is concerned with classification rather than causation, the potential pitfall of data categorization lies less in the loss of data and more in the selection of a poorly justified cut-point. Indeed, given that data paucity often characterizes the available open-source information on terrorism, it would be somewhat disingenuous to claim that small, finite differences in al-Qaida's involvement in events were particularly meaningful; consequently, broad categorical characterizations are ultimately advantageous because they are more robust to data imperfections than continuous estimates. Put differently, newly revealed information will change continuous estimates, but is less likely to shift an event between the "weak" and "strong" categories.

Still, the issue of where to draw boundaries is non-trivial, because events near the cut-point are the exception to this conclusion. David Krackhardt noted such boundary-crossing as an explicit concern in his critique of Granovetter's hypothesis on the value of weak ties and argued that the treatment of middling values, which occur near the cut-point, play a substantial role in [4] The statistical literature in medicine has arguably devoted the most attention to the categorization of continuous data, as studies often like to evaluate prognostic impacts on "high risk," "moderate risk," and "low risk" groups. determining the outcome of strong tie/weak tie analyses.[6] Thus, it is insufficient to merely justify the process of categorization at a theoretical level; detailed attention must be paid to determining exactly where to draw the line between strong and weak ties.

Sadly, the preceding literature offers little relevant guidance. Terrorism scholars offer no specific advice on where to draw boundaries between strong and weak ties when relationship strength is characterized using continuous measurements, and, as the first chapter's literature review made clear, network analysts typically employ inapplicable survey methods when treating the strong tie/weak tie debate as an issue of categorization. Therefore, common sense and simple mathematical measurements served as the ultimate arbiters of this analysis' differentiation.

A two-tiered categorization of ties is explicit to the weak tie/strong tie characterization, so the relevant question centers on where to situate the dividing line between categories, rather than how many categories to define. Three clear rationales emerge for setting the cut-point: (1) Use an absolute definition and set the cut-point to 50 percent, so that all events in which al-Qaida's involvement was at least half of the theoretically possible maximum are considered "strongly tied" to the group. (2) Use a relative definition and set the cut-point equal to al-Qaida's mean level of involvement in events, 58.77 percent, so that only those events in which al-Qaida's role was of above average strength qualify as "strongly tied" to the organization. (3) Use a relative definition and set the cut-point equal to al-Qaida's median level of involvement in events, in this case also 50 percent, so that an equal number of events fall into the ―weak" and ―strong" categories.

Because this analysis considers multiple organizations, the absolute value makes the most sense to use, lest the conception of ―strong" ties differ from organization to organization. A hypothetical example aptly illustrates the logic underlying this decision. Consider an organization that typically plays small supporting roles in attacks. Whether measured by mean or median, this organization's average involvement would be below 50 percent. For the sake of argument, assume both measures of average were 30 percent. Using either of the relative measures to determine if the organizations' ties to an event were ―strong" or ―weak" would then cause a conflicting characterization for events in which the organization partnered with al-Qaida. For example, if the hypothetical organization, al-Qaida, and a third group all played an equal role in an attack, the event would be strongly tied to the hypothetical group described above, but weakly tied to al-Qaida, even though each organization's involvement was 33.3 percent. Thus, absolute cut-points are necessary in order to allow fair cross-comparison, and this analysis considered all events in which al-Qaida's functional involvement was estimated at 50 percent or greater as ―strongly tied" to the organization, while all events in which al-Qaida's functional involvement was estimated at greater than zero, but less than 50 percent, were considered ―weakly tied" to the organization.

This determination yielded 56 plots and 34 attacks that were strongly linked to al-Qaida, as well as 17 plots and 22 attacks that were weakly linked to the organization. However, because the Baleian typology differentiates between events conducted by hit squads in the West and those that are merely strongly tied to bin Laden's organization, it is necessary to first consider the impact of geography in order to determine into which category many of these events fall. Therefore, the next section turns its attention to defining "the West" as a region.

3.3 CONSIDERING GEOGRAPHY

Unfortunately, there is no unanimously agreed upon definition of "the West;" the region's boundaries have shifted over both time and context.[7] This reality introduces some subjectivity into this analysis' classification system, because different definitions of "the West" will greatly affect the relative frequencies of the first and second categories in the Baleian typology. It is, therefore, necessary to carefully evaluate the limitations of various definitional approaches.

Purely geographic definitions are too strict, because they exclude countries like Japan, South Korea, and Singapore, which have decidedly Western economies and Western-influenced political systems, despite their location in the geographic East. However, it would also be a fallacy to assume that economic development is a perfect synonym for Westernization. Indeed, the United Arab Emirates, which sits squarely in Islamists back yard by virtue of its proximity to Saudi Arabia, outranks the United Kingdom by nearly $3,500 in per capita GDP.[8] The extent of democracy is a similarly flawed measurement, because it privileges political representation over economic and cultural measures of Westernization. For example, according to the Economist Intelligence Unit's widely-cited Democracy Index, the otherwise-Westernized Singapore ranks 81st out of 167 countries and fails to even qualify as a "flawed democracy."[9] Some subjectivity is ultimately unavoidable, but because the Human Development Index (HDI) explicitly considers social and economic development, it provides the most intuitively satisfying (though arguably culturally-centric) conceptualization of what it means to be Western.

By and large, this study viewed an HDI ranking of "very high" as synonymous with being part of the West. However, five of the 47 nations with very high scores were excluded because they are heavily culturally influenced by Islam: the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Brunei Darussalam, Cyprus, and Qatar.[10] Difficult questions regarding how to treat many countries in Latin America, a region that some characterizations label as Western while others do not, were side-stepped, as none of the events determined to be strongly tied to al-Qaida occurred in this region. Table 3.1 lists all of the countries determined to be "Western" by the metric outlined above; countries where an al-Qaida hit-squad played a strong functional role in an attack or plot included in the snowball sample have been starred.

[10] These determinations were made based on the CIA World Factbook's demographic breakdowns of religion in the countries. Specifically, the UAE is 96 percent Muslim; Bahrain is 81.2 percent Muslim, Brunei Darussalam is 67 percent Muslim, Cyprus is 18 percent Muslim, and Qatar is 77.5 percent Muslim. Although Croatia played a role in the Bosnian War of the mid-1990s (a conflict with strong religious overtones), the region's Muslim population is largely confined to Bosnia. According to the World Factbook, Croatia is only 1.3 percent Muslim, while Bosnia is 40 percent Muslim. Thus, there is no strong rationale for excluding Croatia from the list of Western countries. Moreover, none of the hit squad attacks occurred in Croatia, so its inclusion or exclusion have no immediate impact on this analysis.

Once used to filter an agent x event matrix depicting the 90 events strongly-tied to al-Qaida, these HDI scores classified 64 events in the first Baleian category and 26 events in the second Baleian category. In order to provide a sense of change over time, figures 3.2 through 3.4 list event totals by year for the first three divisions in the Baleian typology, while Appendix G, located at the end of the study, provides a full listing of the events that fall in each category. However, it is necessary to include a final note on interpretation before presenting these figures: caution is merited because these statistics say nothing about the size of events. The chart counts major events like the 9/11attacks in the same fashion as aborted plots, such as the strike against the 2000 Sydney Olympics that Hambali planned, but never executed,[11] or the 2000 plot against the Israeli Embassy in Canberra that was initiated and then later abandoned by Jack Roche, a British-born convert to Islam who received explosives training at an al-Qaida camp in Afghanistan and met with bin Laden.[12] Similarly, it is important to remember that this analysis attempted to exclude events conducted in the context of insurgency, so the counts are not representative of al-Qaida's total involvement in violence.

3.4 CONSIDERING TIME

In order to determine the quantity of events that fall into the fourth Baleian category, namely that containing attacks and plots tied to individuals who formerly held strong ties to al-Qaida and now operate independent of the organization, it is necessary to begin by considering the impact of time and find all those individuals in the data who made clear breaks with al-Qaida. This study defines a "clear break" as a minimum gap of two years since an individual last held modeled-membership in al-Qaida or trained in a bin Laden-funded camp. Although in the real world two years without contact represents a substantial enough separation to consider ties with al-Qaida broken, the ambiguities inherent to the open-source data on terrorism and the resulting fuzziness of the model's ability to time organizational affiliations dictate cautious interpretation of these alumni's role in terrorism. There is a possibility that some of the separations evident in the data are false and result because ties were well-hidden, rather than absent.

Consider Bilal Khazal as an example. His historical ties to al-Qaida are clear; he trained in Afghanistan circa 1998 and met with both Ayman al-Zawahiri and Usama bin Laden. Press reports even allege that CIA analysts described Khazal as an al-Qaida member.[13] However, Khazal vanished from the data after these initial interactions and did not reemerge until 2002, when he played a role in the funding, logistical support, and possibly also the planning of a bombing perpetrated against a McDonald's franchise in Lebanon.[14] Although the data contains no additional information on his interactions with members of bin Laden's organization in the four years between his training and the bombing, there is a strong chance that data paucity caused Khazal to seem falsely separated from al-Qaida. Consequently, cautious interpretation is again necessary, because the timing and duration of individuals' membership in al-Qaida is sensitive to new information.

With this caveat, al-Qaida's alumni were tied to a total of 61 events that do not otherwise involve active members of bin Laden's organization. Unfortunately, data restrictions preclude a more nuanced characterization that considers the strength of this involvement. The vast majority of these alumni events occur in regions characterized by poor media coverage and legal systems that lack transparency, making it impossible to obtain the detailed information necessary to reliably estimate the scale of former al-Qaida members' involvement in events.

Fahid Mohammed Ally Msalam (a.k.a. Abu Usama al-Kini) offers an example. After training in Afghanistan in the mid-1990s, he played a key logistical role in the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi, Kenya, by helping other members of the attack team to acquire vehicles, safe houses, and explosive detonators.[15] He then vanished to Pakistan and did not reemerge in an operational context until 2007, when he was involved in an assassination attempt on Benazir Bhutto, which failed to kill the Pakistani politician, but caused nearly 150 other deaths.[16] However, the available information on Msalam's role in this attack is limited to two passing comments made in the news media following his death in a drone strike in 2009:

(1) "Kini was also thought to have been behind an unsuccessful attempt on the life of former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, who was later killed in a separate attack, US officials said." (BBC News)[17]

Usama bin Laden, et al (Defendants), United States District Court Southern District of New York (S(7) 98 Cr. 1023), Day 19 of testimony (March 19, 2001); Federal Bureau of Investigation, "Bombings of the Embassies of the United States of American at Nairobi, Kenya, and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania August 7, 1998," (Declassified Summary of FBI Investigation Report), November 18, 1998.
[16] For casualty statistics on the attack, see: Report of the United Nations Commission of Inquiry into the facts and circumstances of the assassination of former Pakistani Prime Minister Mohtarma Benazir Bhutto, April 15, 2010. For information on Msalam's involvement in the attack, see the two citations below.

(2) –Al-Kini was also linked to a failed assassination attempt on late Pakistani prime minister Benazir Bhutto when she returned to Pakistan in October 2007. She was killed two months later in a gun and suicide attack in Rawalpindi." (Agence France Press)[18]

Moreover, the only other accounts that provide any detailed information on the participants in the 2007 attack implied that Qari Saifullah Akhtar, a HUJI leader arrested on terror charges in 2004 and then released under mysterious circumstances the following year,[19] bore responsibility for the attack. For example, the Washington Post stated:

–Qari Saifullah Akhtar, who has been in Pakistani police custody before, was arrested Monday in the eastern city of Lahore for alleged involvement in the October suicide bombing in Karachi that hit Bhutto's homecoming parade when she returned from exile, Interior Minister Hamid Nawaz said."[20]

Without additional information that is not currently in evidence, it would be unfair to draw detailed conclusions about the relative scale of Msalam and Akhtar's involvement, or to conclude that Msalam's ties to bin Laden's organization were ongoing. Therefore, figure 3.5, which lists the number of events that fall into the fourth Baleian category, provides a rough approximation of the role that al-Qaida's alumni play in terrorism, rather than a refined estimate.

3.5 CONSIDERING IDEOLOGY

Clive Williams, whose analysis of the nature of relationships among violent Islamists contributed greatly to the ontology this analysis used to classify link types, provides an excellent starting point for the discussion of plots and events tied to al-Qaida via ideological and uncertain ties. Because links include ―anything serving to connect one part or thing with another,"[21] Williams concluded that it is difficult to find any Salafist-motivated event that is not connected to al-Qaida by at least some measure of diffuse ideological overlap. Consequently, bounding an inquiry into this class of events is exceptionally challenging.

In order to avoid conflating al-Qaida, as an organization, with the broader Islamist terror movement, this analysis included in this category only those events that demonstrate explicit ideological ties to bin Laden's organization or its members, as demonstrated by statements of support for the organization or its leaders, documented possession of propaganda materials produced by the organization or its members, or documented online viewing of propaganda materials produced by the organization or its members. However, two factors complicate this effort. First, open-sources rarely, if ever, contain full information on terrorists' reading and viewing habits. Consequently, the full extent of their adherence to al-Qaida's specific vision of jihad is often subject to debate.

Shahawar Matin Siraj, a 24 year-old native of Karachi, Pakistan, arrested for plotting to bomb New York's Herald Square in 2004, offers an example. As he was born into the Ismaili sect, a Shia group known for its secularism, he had no family history of Sunni extremism.[22] He apparently became radicalized after immigrating illegally to the United States in 1999 and taking work in an Islamic bookshop, where he became an avid reader of fundamentalist literature.[23] Unfortunately, the record contains no information on the specific authors that he read. It is impossible to judge how great an impact al-Qaida ideologues had on his thoughts, because Siraj both praised and criticized bin Laden's organization. He reportedly told one undercover officer that bin Laden was "a talented brother and a great planner" whom he hoped had "planned something big for America,"[24] yet in conversations recorded by another informant, Siraj stated that al-Qaida planners' reliance on suicide bombers demonstrated a lack of talent[25] and argued that bombings should cause "No killing. Only economic problems."[26] Thus, labeling him as an "al-Qaida inspired terrorist" may overstate the case, but it is also easy to see how a lack of information on terrorists' specific reading habits or online activity could lead to an under-estimation of al-Qaida's ideological role in other cases.

A second related issue concerns the lack of nuance found in many estimations of al-Qaida's ideological role in terror plots. Observers, even those with access to detailed information on terrorists' personal histories, are often far too casual in their usage of al-Qaida's name. They often attribute a role to the organization where none exists, thereby causing the very type of conflation that this analysis hopes to avoid.

As an example, consider the 2007 plot against JFK airport. Following the arrest of the key perpetrators, the U.S. Department of Justice issued a statement emphasizing that the plotters ―attempted to enlist support from prominent international terrorist groups and leaders . . . . [including] Adnan El Shukrijumah, an al Qaeda leader."[27] However, the details of the case suggest that the plotters had no affinity for al-Qaida's Sunni vision of Islam, much less that they attempted to enlist the organization's logistical support.

Russell Defreitas, an American citizen of Guyanese birth who initiated the JFK plot, was apparently motivated by long-standing resentment over America's role in the Palestinian conflict and sympathized especially strongly with the plight of Hizballah, a Shia organization, in the 2006 Lebanon War.[28] Abdul Kadir, a former member of the Guyanese Parliament and the plot's other primary planner, had once used his elected position to spy for the benefit of Iran,[29] and felt spiritually obligated to follow fatwas (religious decrees) issued by the Shia clerics who rule that country.[30] He even sent two of his children to study Shia Islam in Tehran.[31] Given this information, it seems a stretch to conclude that al-Qaida's vision of a global Sunni theocracy held any particular appeal for these Shia-motivated plotters.

How then did Shukrijumah's name come-up in relation to the case? It seems that the plotters discussed him somewhat in passing. Because his father had been born in Guyana, Shukrijumah shared aspects of the plotters' ethno-national heritage,[32] and they held him in fawning adoration as an example of what motivated Guyanese Muslims can accomplish in jihad.[33] According to one law-enforcement official who held full access to the unedited recordings made by informants involved in the case against Defreitas and Kadir, Shukrijumah had ~~n~~no connection with the operation."[34] While definitive assessments cannot be made until the transcripts of the recorded conversations become publically available, it seems quite likely that the justice department overstated the extent of the JFK plotters' ideological overlap with al-Qaida when they suggested that the team led by Defreitas and Kadir actively sought the support of bin Laden's organization.

Unfortunately, the JFK case is somewhat unique in the level of detail available from open-sources. Researchers rarely have access to enough data to probe the accuracy of official characterization of events and must simply trust that the authorities are correct when they assert the existence of ideological links between a plot or attack and al-Qaida. An over-estimation of the organization's role in Islamist terrorism may consequently result. For all of the ambiguity inherent to estimating other aspects of al-Qaida's participation in terrorist events, determining the number of events with explicit ideological ties to the organization is likely the most difficult challenge of all. Therefore, figure 3.6, which lists the number of plots and attacks that display demonstrable explicit ideological ties to al-Qaida without otherwise involving active members of the organization or its alumni, should be interpreted with according cynicism.

3.6 CONSIDERING THE REMAINDER

Methodologically speaking, it is fairly easy to determine the events that fall into the remaining typological category, which deals with events that display no links of any kind to al-Qaida. All plots and attacks that appear in the snowball sample, but do not fall into any of the preceding categories belong here. Because these events fall outside of this study's explicit focus on al-Qaida, they are not analyzed in any great detail. Figure 3.7 lists the plots and attacks that fall into this category by year.

3.7 TRENDS

Although this analysis does not conduct any detailed analysis of the events that fall into the sixth Baleian category, they provide an appropriate starting place for discussing overall trends in the data, because these events make it possible to scale the size of the other categories relative to the broader phenomenon of Islamist terrorism. Simple arithmetic dictates that dividing the number of events in each category by the total number of events in the sample will yield comparative ratios that describe the categories‘ relative frequencies. Moreover, if the snowball sample, which like all data samples is an incomplete approximation of a larger population, accurately represents the whole of Islamist terrorism, then these ratios describe the frequency with which these patterns exist in the real world. The upper graph in figure 3.9 provides a summary view that depicts these frequencies in a single static snapshot that captures all of the data, and the lower graphs in figure 3.9 provide a sense of how these patterns have shifted over time by presenting annualized totals. The middle figure shows raw numbers and clearly depicts fluctuations in overall scale, and the bottom figure repeats the information in percent terms, in order to depict annual changes in the relative frequency of each category in the Baleian typology.

3.7.1 CATEGORY 1

The number of terror events in which al-Qaida has played a strong role and that took place outside the West has fluctuated greatly over time, and fell off sharply after 2004. As the paragraphs below outline in brief, these trends likely result from changes in al-Qaida's operational environment. Given that this analysis largely excludes events conducted outside the context of insurgency, it would be premature to conclude that the organization has ceased to play a strong role in operations conducted outside the West; instead, al-Qaida's non-Western activities may have simply changed in type, as circumstances have forced the organization to engage in irregular warfare against coalition forces in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The first non-Western event in which al-Qaida played a strong role took place in 1990, when Abu Hafs al-Masry, a founding member of bin Laden's organization, orchestrated the murder of Rifaat al-Mahgoub, the speaker of the Egyptian parliament.[35] Aside from this largely individual role, al-Qaida's first strong organizational role in an event took place in 1993, when the organization played a role in an attack in Yemen on a hotel housing U.S. servicemen preparing to deploy to the humanitarian conflict in Somalia.[36] The following year, al-Qaida's activity spiked, largely as a result of the multi-national activities of Ramzi Yousef, who graduated from al-Qaida's Khaldan Camp,[37] before heading to the Philippines for the first time, where he met Aburajak Janjalani,[38] who was both the founder of ASG[39] and a disciple of Abdul

Rasool Sayyaf,[40] an Afghan trainer whom bin Laden had funded since the mid-1980s[41] and with whom Yousef's uncle, KSM, forged exceptionally close bonds.[42]

Yousef was heavily involved in a host of daring plots in Manila in 1994 and 1995, granting al-Qaida a strong role in these events. He considered assassinating President Bill Clinton and Pope John Paul II during their respective visits to the Philippines,[43] and Yousef orchestrated the Bojinka plot, which sought to use timed, liquid-based explosive devices to simultaneously bring-down a dozen U.S.-flagged jetliners over the Pacific.[44] However, Yousef also attempted to bomb the Israeli embassy in Bangkok in 1994 (the plot only failed because his driver crashed the bomb-truck en route to the attack site) and played a leading role in an attack on a Shiite shrine in Iran.[45]

In 1996 and 1997, al-Qaida played no strong role in the conduct of attacks because of two factors. First, Ramzi Yousef was captured in Pakistan, when a student he was attempting to recruit into jihad turned-in the terrorist to obtain the multi-million dollar reward the U.S. State Department had offered for his capture.[46] Second, al-Qaida lost its sanctuary in the Sudan. Hassan al-Turabi, the nation's leader, bowed to Western pressure and formally expelled bin Laden. The dissident Saudi's financial resources were greatly depleted by the move, because it forced him to leave behind a host of businesses and properties in the greater Khartoum area.[47] Bin Laden found a new home in Afghanistan, but his initial relationship with the Taliban was shaky, and his organization did not yet have the same freedom of latitude it had enjoyed during the bulk of its time in the Sudan.[48] Effectively, 1996 and 1997 were lean years for al-Qaida as an organization.

The numbers partially belie the extent of al-Qaida's strong involvement in terror events outside the West over the next few years, because each of the organization's events was particularly large in scale. In 1998, al-Qaida conducted a pair of large attacks in East Africa, where it targeted U.S. Embassies in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, and Nairobi, Kenya.[49] That same year, the organization also plotted to use Stinger missiles against American targets in Saudi Arabia,[50] and owing to ties between Usama bin Laden and Omar al-Khatab, a principle planner of the 1999 Moscow bombings, which injured more than 200,[51] the model also attributes al-Qaida with a strong role in that Russian attack.

Similarly, in 2000, the organization attempted to bomb the U.S.S. The Sullivans when the ship was in port in Yemen, but the attack failed when the watercraft bearing the explosives sank under their weight. This failure served as a learning experience, because later that year, the organization conducted a successful attack on the U.S.S. Cole using identical maritime tactics.[52]

In 2001, the organization plotted against Israeli embassies in India, Azerbaijan, the Philippines, and Australia,[53] and considered attacking the Panama canal, before abandoning the idea.[54] The following year saw al-Qaida conduct more attacks in Eastern Africa, when members of the organization led attacks on a Mombasa hotel frequented by Israeli tourists and attempted to shoot-down an Israeli-owned jetliner as it departed Mombasa's airport.[55] Moreover, al-Qaida's prominent events for the year included an attack on U.S. Marines on Kuwait's Filika Island,[56]an attack against an historic synagogue in Tunisia,[57] attacks against Afghanistan's newly-formed government,[58] and a pair of additional maritime plots: one against the Limburgh, a French oil tanker operating in the waters around Yemen,[59] and the other against ships in the Strait of Hormuz.[60] Finally, in 2002, al-Qaida was strongly involved in the kidnapping and murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl in Karachi; however, this event differed from al-Qaida's previous patterns in important ways. Rather than planning and executing the attack, al-Qaida played a strong role in the attack because KSM reportedly purchased Pearl from the otherwise-independent kidnappers, before personally slitting the reporter's throat.[61]

In 2003, the number of non-Western terrorist events in which al-Qaida played a strong role remained near the peak values of 2002, owing largely to the impact of several events that occurred along the fuzzy line between insurgency and terrorism. As for plots, the organization considered shooting-down jetliners in Somalia,[62] as well as El-Al flights leaving Bangkok.[63] Al-Qaida also plotted against American targets in South Korea,[64] American interests in Pakistan, American diplomats in both Yemen and Saudi Arabia,[65] and several additional targets in East Africa.[66] The most prominent attacks were the bombing of housing compounds that catered to Westerners in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia,[67] and a series of bombings in Istanbul, Turkey, that targeted synagogues, a Western-owned bank, and the British consulate.[68] Moreover, al-Qaida members targeted civilians in several attacks that took place in Iraq and Afghanistan, such as the car-bombing of Shiites in Najaf[69] and the bombing of the Jordanian Embassy in Baghdad.[70] Finally, al-Qaida played a prominent role in a pair of assassination attempt on Pervez Musharraf, who then served as Pakistan's prime minister.[71]

The following year, 2004, saw a marked decline in the number of attacks on civilians in which al-Qaida played a strong role. Individuals who received training in al-Qaida camps in Waziristan conducted a series of smaller-scale attacks in Pakistan, including an attack on a state-sanctioned paramilitary force,[72] in which the model deemed al-Qaida played a strong role. Several additional attacks that straddle the line between insurgency and terrorism took place in Iraq, such as the kidnappings and beheadings of American businessman Nicholas Berg[73] and the suicide bombing of Ezzedine Salim, the president of the Iraqi governing council.[74] In North Africa, al-Qaida was strongly linked to the truck-bombing of an Algerian electrical facility,[75] and in Jordan, al-Qaida members were strongly involved in a plot to use chemical weapons.[76]

From 2005 through 2007, the data sample contains no events conducted outside the West in which al-Qaida played a strong role. Although the data on non-Western attacks in not particularly robust for 2008, it suggests that al-Qaida played a strong role in two attacks that year that again straddled the line between insurgency and terrorism. Specifically, the model states that al-Qaida members were strongly involved in the murder of a retired Pakistani general[77] and the kidnapping of Pakistani police officers and state bank officials.[78]

For the remaining two years in the data, the model attributes al-Qaida with a strong role in one non-Western event per yer. In 2009, members of bin Laden's organization were strongly linked to a suicide bombing that used a double-agent to target American intelligence personnel operating in Afghanistan.[79] Finally, in 2010, al-Qaida played an important role in a plot to conduct an armed rampage in European cities, using tactics that mirrored those that LeT adopted in its 2008 attack on hotels and other landmarks in southern Mumbai.[80]

Given that the American-led Global War on Terrorism (GWOT) began in 2001 and assumed massive dimensions by 2003, when the U.S. invaded Iraq, counterterrorism efforts offer a plausible, if somewhat obvious, explanation for the marked decline in al-Qaida activity that began circa 2004. Though the network data is quantitative in nature, the ambiguities inherent to both open-sources and the membership-modeling process dictate that it is ill-suited to regression; therefore, in order to more fully explore the nature and extent of changes to al-Qaida's operational capability, the fourth chapter will conduct three detailed case studies that explore the depth of training, operational capabilities, financial assistance, and logistical support al-Qaida made available to operatives involved in attacks that occurred at three different points in the organization's development. Specifically, the chapter will examine (1) the 1998 bombings of U.S. Embassies in East Africa, which occurred prior to the GWOT; (2) the 2002 bombings in

Al-Qaida has deployed hit squads to the West fairly consistently since the millennium. According to the model's formal determination, the Islamic Group under the leadership of Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman bore responsibility for the 1993 World Trade Center Bombings.[81] Similarly, the model found that al-Qaida was weakly involved (14.29 percent) in the plot to bomb LAX in 1999, just ahead of the millennium, with stronger roles going to the GIA and agents of unknown organizational membership (42.86 percent for each of these groups).[82] Therefore, al-Qaida's first strong involvement in a hit squad attack on the West took place in 2000, when Iyam Farris, an Ohio-based truck-driver who also sent camping supplies to support al-Qaida's training operations in Afghanistan, plotted to attack a mall in Columbus, OH, before abandoning the plan.[83]

The following year saw a drastic increase, as measured by both quantity and scale of events, in al-Qaida's use of hit squad attacks against the West. Most notoriously, al-Qaida operatives attacked New York and Washington, DC, on September 11th.[84] However, in 2001,

KSM also plotted to poison U.S. water supplies,[85] and dispatched Richard Reid, who gained dubious renown as the failed "shoe bomber," to suicide-bomb an American-flagged jet as it traveled between Paris and the United States, using explosive devices hidden within his footwear.[86] Other al-Qaida members plotted to attack the U.S. Embassy in Pairs, and Kleine-Brogel Air Base in Belgium, before a series of arrests derailed their efforts.[87]

The following year, al-Qaida was strongly involved in six additional plots conducted by hit squads. KSM plotted to attack Heathrow Airport and other landmarks,[88] and Jose Padilla's much publicized arrest in Chicago unveiled a KSM-linked plot to "dirty bomb" the heartland by detonating a conventional explosive device wrapped inside of a layer of radioactive material.[89] Iyam Farris, the same operative involved in the Columbus plot, investigated the logistical requirements that would be needed to cut the cables supporting suspension bridges in New York City.[90] Other KSM-affiliated operatives supported un-named plots by attempting to smuggle explosives into New York via textile shipments,[91] and a fifth group linked to the infamous plotter explored operations against US Naval interests and shipping vessels operating in the Strait of Hormuz and Singapore.[92] Finally, a sixth group of operatives, many of whom were drawn from Southeast Asia in the belief that their non-Middle Eastern appearance would be less likely to rouse suspicions in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, plotted to emulate the events of September 11, 2001, by hijacking jetliners and then crashing them into targets on America's West Coast.[93]

For 2003, the model attributes a strong role to al-Qaida for only two events: a plot to bomb French-owned Reunion Island in the Indian Ocean,[94] and a Baltimore-based plot to wreak havoc by detonating underground gasoline-storage containers.[95] However, in 2004, al-Qaida began a series of hit-squad attacks against the city of London that stretched through 2006. These events included an event widely known as the Crevice plot, in which a group of British-born Muslims, who had trained in al-Qaida camps, made preparations to bomb landmarks around the city using explosive devices constructed from nitrogen-based fertilizer, before a string of arrests, reportedly made after British intelligence intercepted a communique from the attack team's handlers abroad, disrupted the plot.[96] Two participants in the Cerivce plot who managed to escape arrest were then among the suicide-bombers who perpetrated the July 7, 2005, attacks on London's mass transit system,[97] and individuals who shared diffuse links to the July 7th bombers attempted a nearly identical attack 14 days later, on July 21, 2005.[98] Finally, in 2006, a third group of London-based plotters that had received training and planning help from al-Qaida were arrested as they made preparations to bomb transatlantic flights leaving Heathrow airport using liquid-based explosives.[99]

In the following year, al-Qaida was not strongly involved in any hit squad attacks on the West, but the model attributes al-Qaida with strong involvement in two plots that targeted Europe in 2008. In the first, suicide-bombers sought to attack the mass transit system in Barcelona, Spain.[100] In the the second, attackers planned to seek revenge against the Danish publishers of a series of cartoons that offended Muslims the world-over by offering satryrical depictions of the prophet Mohammed.[101]

Finally, in 2009 and 2010, the model attributes al-Qaida with a strong role in one plot each year. Specifically, in 2009, Al-Qaida deployed trainees to Queens, New York, to conduct bombings targeting the subway,[102] and in 2010, bin Laden‘s organization played a strong role in a nascent plot to target American stadiums. However, this effort toward terrorism was interrupted by arrests made during the course of the investigation into the previous plot against the Danish newspaper.[103]

While this narrative suggests that al-Qaida has been fairly consistent in its efforts to target the West by deploying hit squads, it is important to consider more than just the number of operations. The fifth chapter includes detailed case studies of the 9/11 attacks, the inter-related attempts to attack London in 2004 and 2005, and the 2009 plot against New York. These studies demonstrate that the sophistication of al-Qaida's hit squad attacks and the quality of the operatives involved have declined steadily over time. In short, the numbers described in the preceding sub-section do not tell the full story.

3.7.3 CATEGORY 3

Throughout its operational history, al-Qaida has had weak functional involvement in a number of terrorist events. Because al-Qaida has cooperated with a number of different regional organizations throught the course of this involvement, the events included in this category span a wide geographic area. Relevant events have taken place in the Americas, Europe, the Middle East, Africa, South Asia, and East Asia.

Al-Qaida's weak functional involvement in terror events began circa 1994, when individuals holding ties to both EIJ and al-Qaida conducted a failed attack on Cairo's Khan al-Khalili district, an area popular with Western tourists.[104] That same year, al-Qaida members were involved alongside accomplices of unknown membership in an attempt to obtain uranium for an unspecified WMD attack, presumably against Western targets.[105] Al-Qaida supported two additional EIJ attacks in 1995, namely the bombing of the Egyptian Embassy in Islamabad[106] and a failed assassination attempt on Hosni Mubarak that took place during a state visit to Ethiopia.[107] Similarly, al-Qaida played a substantial (46.67 percent) role, though one that was still weak according to the model's formal characterization, in the 1997 Luxor Massacre, in which gunmen slaughtered tourists visiting Egyptian archaeological sites.[108]

Al-Qaida was not weakly involved in any events in 1998, but when bin Laden's organization became active again in 1999, its focus moved beyond EIJ. The organization supported two plots by Jemaah Islamiyah (JI). The first targeted sites frequented by U.S. Naval personnel in Singapore.[109] The second targeted Megawati, the Indonesian vice president, but both plots were abandoned for unknown reasons.[110] Beyond Southeast Asia, al-Qaida played a supporting role in 1999 in one plot against the United States, namely the LAX millennium plot, as well as in a second millennial plot that targeted Western hotels in Amman, Jordan.[111]

The following year, al-Qaida continued its support of Jemaah Islamiyah. Bin Laden's organization played a supporting role in three attacks and one plot conducted by the Southeast Asian organization. According to accomplice testimony, the 2000 Christmas Eve attacks, which targeted Christian churches in several cities across Indonesia in a string of nearly-simultaneous bombings, were undertake at bin Laden's behest, though JI planned and executed the attacks almost entirely on its own.[112] Similarly, al-Qaida played a a very minor role in a string of bombings that JI, the Abu Sayyaf Group, and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front[113]—an Islamist insurgent group fighting for an independent Muslim state in the Southern Philippines[114]—conducted in partnership in Metro Manila on Rizal Day, a Philippine national holiday commemorating one of the most prominent fighters in that country's struggle for independence from Spain. Al-Qaida's role in JI's bombing of the Philippine Ambassador's residence in Jakarta in early August was slightly more substantial,[115] and bin Laden's organization was approximately 1/3 culpable for a nascent plot against the Sydney Olympics that JI considered and then abandoned.[116]

A pattern of overlapping membership dictated that al-Qaida continued to play a role in JI operations in 2001 and 2002. Specifically, the model attributes al-Qaida with weak involvement in a pair of inter-related plots, which initially targeted Western diplomatic facilities in Manila, before the plotters switched their focus to similar facilities in Singapore, when the Philippine-based targets proved impractical.[117] According to the model, al-Qaida also played a supporting role in JI's 2001 bombing of the Atrium mall in Jakarta,[118] and in 2002, al-Qaida provided some vague support to JI-linked bombings and arsons that occurred in Indonesia and the southern Philippines,[119] as well as to a plot against Western embassies in Cambodia.[120] However, the organizations‘ highest profile cooperation came in fall of the year, when al-Qaida provided some funding that earned the organization a minor role in JI‘s most notorious attack: the 2002 bombings in Bali, Indonesia, which killed more than 200 and remains Southeast Asia‘s deadliest terrorist attack.[121]

The durable pattern of al-Qaida support for JI operations continued in 2003. That year, bin Laden‘s organization played a weak, supporting role in the JI‘s 2003 bombing of J.W. Marriott Hotel in Jakarta,[122] as well as a Hambali-led plot against western interests in Bangkok, Thailand.[123] Finally, al-Qaida may have helped a JI splinter conduct an attack on the Australian Embassy in Jakarta in 2004.[124]

However, al-Qaida‘s supporting role in attacks was by no means limited to JI operations. In 2003, al-Qaida played a weak role in a rocket attack on ISAF headquarters in Kabul, Afganistan—an attack that reportedly involved Hezbi e Islami Gulubuddin and the Taliban,[125] as well as individuals of unknown membership. Similarly, al-Qaida was weakly involved in several attacks that took place in and around Karachi in 2004,[126] as well as in a WMD plot against U.S. financial targets that same year.[127] Finally, the model attributes al-Qaida with a weak role in the 2004 Madrid bombings, which targeted commuter rail lines and killed nearly 200.[128]

Although the model does not attribute al-Qaida with weak involvement in any attacks that took place between 2005 and 2007, it seems that bin Laden's organization saw a minor resurgence in its supportive role in 2008. That year, al-Qaida was involved in the planning of a nascent plot against the commuter rail system that runs between New York City and Long Island.[129] The model also suggests that al-Qaida may have played a weak role in Lashkar-e-Toiba's assault on southern Mumbai, though this estimate likely results from the data's annualized nature.

Specifically, David Headley, the American citizen who conducted the bulk of the surveillance in advance of the Mumbai assault, soured on LeT when the organization declined to support an additional operation he had begun to plan against the Danish publishers of the Mohammed cartoons. Headley then began working alongside Ilyas Kashmiri, a militant whom some knowledgeable observers speculated might be in line for to head al-Qaida after bin Laden's death, in furtherance of the Danish plot. Because both events took place in 2008, the model attributes Headley with functional membership in both LeT and al-Qaida for that year, which likely causes it to seem that al-Qaida played a role in the Mumbai attacks when none seems to have existed.

Finally, as the result of training one member of an otherwise independent attack team, al Qaida played a weak role in one final plot. It took place in Norway in 2010, when a multi-ethnic attack-team comprised of immigrants from Iraq, the Uighur region of China, and Uzbekistan made preparations to use hydrogen peroxide-based explosives to target Oslo, only to have the plot unravel because one member of the team began working as a police informant.[130]

Given the wide range of organizations and regions included in this category, it is difficult to select representative cases. However, the largest number of events with weak functional links to al-Qaida occurred in Southeast Asia, which indicates that this region offers the best representation of events displaying weak al-Qaida involvement. Consequently, the sixth chapter explores the nature and extent of al-Qaida's role in five events that occurred in Indonesia between 2002 and 2009, in order to demonstrate how the organization's patterns of weak involvement have changed over time. Specifically, this chapter considers patterns of planning help, financial assistance, logistical support, and terror training in relation to the 2002 Bali bombings, the 2003 bombing of the J.W. Marriott Hotel in Jakarta, the 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta, the 2005 Bali bombings, and the 2009 nearly-simultaneous bombing of the J.W. Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels in Jakarta.

3.7.4 CATEGORY 4

The fourth Baleian category, which contains events tied to individuals who made clear breaks with bin Laden's organization, contains 61 events. Although a handful of these took place in the early 1990s, the vast bulk of events occurred between 2001 and 2010, and a pronounced increase began circa 2007, shortly after al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) established itself as an independent organization.

In terms of specifics, the majority of the early interactions took place in either New York or the Philippines. The model attributes al-Qaida alumni with a weak role in series of events perpetrated by members of the Islamic Group, including the 1993 World Trade Center bombings and a follow-on plot to attack other prominent landmarks around the city.[131] Similarly, given that Aburajak Janjalani, the founder of the Philippines-based Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG), left al-Qaida's Afghan camps in the early 1990s,[132] the model attributes alumni of bin Laden's organization with involvement in a pair of kidnappings that Janjalani helped to plan and execute in the Philippines in 1994 and 1995.[133]

The next events involving former members of al-Qaida take place in the early 2000s. The model attributed al-Qaida's alumni with a weak role in a 2000 plot to mount a gas-attack on the European parliament,[134] as well as a strong role in another gas-plot, this one in 2001 and directed against un-named French targets.[135] During this same period, the model attributes former members of al-Qaida with a measure of responsibility for two events JI conducted in Southeast Asia: a 2001 plot against an airbase in Singapore,[136] and the 2001 bombing of churches in East Jakarta.[137]

Similarly, the model attributes al-Qaida's alumni with a measure of responsibility for several more kidnapping perpetrated by ASG in 2000 and 2001. This characterization stems from the involvement of Aburajak Janjalani's younger brother, Khadafi,[138] who the model labled as a functional member of al-Qaida in the late 1980s because of his interactions with Mohamed Jamal Khalifa, one of bin Laden's brothers-in-law and a well-known financier of terrorism in his own right.[139]

In 2002, al-Qaida alumni were responsible for plots against the U.S. embassy in Rome and a McDonald's franchise in Lebannon, as well as two events that took place in 2003: the murder of British citizens working as teachers in Somalia,[140] and a plot to crash jetliners into Singapore's Changi Airport.[141] Beyond these releatively obscure events, former members of al-Qaida also played a weak role in the 2003 Casablanca attacks, in which suicide-bombers targeted a host of Jewish and Western-affiliated sites around the Moroccan city.[142] And the following year, al-Qaida alumni were involved in a second high-profile event: the 2004 plot against the Spanish courts, which hoped to target the trial of the surviving members of the attack-team that conducted the Madrid train bombings.[143]

Beginning in 2005, former members of al-Qaida played a role in a host of events conducted in North Africa by the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, an organization better known by its French-language acronym, GSPC, and then later as al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Most prominently, these events included a 2005 plot to attack oil refineries

Although al-Qaida alumni continued to participate in attacks in locations as diverse as Afghanistan,[147] Indonesia,[148] and Somalia,[149] former members of bin Laden's organization played their highest-profile role in a series of attacks involving AQAP, which formed as an organization when several inmates, who had been detained for their role in al-Qaida attacks, escaped from a Yemeni prison and began plotting events without the input of bin Laden's organization.[150] Specifically, former members of al-Qaida were involved in the 2007 suicide-bombing of Spanish tourists in Yemen,[151] a 2009 suicide-bombing that targeted Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Nayef, but failed to kill him;[152] the 2009 kidnapping of German and British nationals in Yemen,[153] the 2009 failed _underpants' bombing, which occurred on Christmas Day, when a Nigerian jihadist attempted to detonate an explosive device hidden beneath his clothes onboard a Detroit-bound international flight;[154] and a 2010 plot to remote-bomb American-owned cargo planes in flight.[155]

In an effort to shed light on the nature and extent of former al-Qaida members' involvement in Islamist terrorism, the seventh chapter examines the events involving AQAP and AQIM. Specifically, the chapter examines issues of attack planning, attack finance, attack logistics, and training in order to demonstrate the alumni's independence from al-Qaida. Moreover, the analysis posits that access to financial resources, in these cases revenue from smuggling and substantial ransoms obtained from kidnapping Westerners, enabled these organizations to operate without the benefit of al-Qaida's functional support.

3.7.5 CATEGORY 5

In total, 32 events fall into the fifth Baleian category, which contains events that hold explicit ideological links to al-Qaida but are not otherwise tied to the organization. A handful of these events, such as the 1990 murder of Rabbi Meyer Kahane by one of Sheikh Omar Obdel Rahman's followers and a hastily conducted bombing of a Grenwich Village gay bar by the same man, took place early in al-Qaida's history and were ideologically tied to bin Laden's organization because individuals outside of al-Qaida were influenced by radical clerics inside it. However, the majority of the events in this category occurred after 1998, when al-Qaida first rose to international prominence following the 1998 bombings of U.S. Embassies in East Africa. Logically, this makes sense, as it is difficult for individuals to develop an ideological affinity for the beliefs of a group they do not know exists.

However, events to which to al-Qaida holds ideological ties without sharing any other sort of current or past functional relationship have been relatively infrequent. The organization was ideologically linked to one event in 2000, namely a plot to bomb the Christmas market in Strasbourg, France, as well as an attack on the Indian Parliament the following year. The model found no relevant events in 2002, while 2003 and 2004 each contained one additional event. Respectively, they were a 2003 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, and the 2004 Leganes suicide, a massive blast that several of the men responsible for the 2004 Madrid train bombing conducted after attempting to phone Britain—likely to reach the radical clearic Abu Qatada—when police closed-in on the apartment the terrorists were using as a safehouse.[156]

In 2005, there were six events with explicit ideological links to al-Qaida. These events ranged widely in terms of both their nature and their location. For example, these events included the desecration of an Italian colonial cemetery, which was presumably Catholic, in Somalia; the bombing of Western hotels in Amman, Jordan; a nascent plot against Sydney's harbor bridge, which sought to emulate the tactics of 9/11 by flying a hijacked plane into the transportation artery; another suicide plot against un-named targets in the same Australian city; a nascent plot against a Christian school in East Java; and a plot to bomb U.S. piplelines and refineries, which a wanna-be mercenary named Michael Curtis Reynolds, who was upset about the Iraq War and aggrieved by the revocation of his passport, hoped to conduct for al-Qaida on a for-pay basis.[157]

The following year saw two unusual and entirely aspirational _plots' that displayed ideological ties to al-Qaida. Both were conducted by the Sea of David, a cultish religious sect that practiced a syncretic blend of Islam, Christianity, and Judaism. Although they were so lacking in resources that they asked the FBI informant who posed as their al-Qaida contact to provide them with combat boots and other basic equipment; although they had no terror training beyond exercise sessions that the group held in an abandoned warehouse; and although the group‘s unusual religious practices would have been anathema to bin Laden‘s brand of fundamentalism, the Sea of David plotters hoped to bomb FBI buildings in Florida and Chicago‘s Sears‘ Tower in al-Qaida‘s name. They believed that the two groups‘ shared hatred of the United States government was sufficient to ensure cooperation, and, like Reynolds, hoped to work for bin Laden‘s organization on a for-pay basis.[158]

In 2007, there were four additional events that fell into the fifth Baleian category, and like the events of 2005, these ranged widely in terms of context and location. Two occurred in Indonesia: an aborted plot to generate terror funds by robbing Chinese-owned businesses in Lampung, and a plot to bomb a Café in Bukittingi, which the suicide bomber abandoned at the last minute.[159] Two more events, both of them prominent, took place in Pakistan: the siege of the Red Mosque in Islamabad,[160] and the assassination of Benazir Bhutto in Rawalpindi.[161] Finally, a fifth event took place in the United States: the plot against Fort Dix, New Jersey, a largely botched attempt at terrorism led by three Albanian-born brothers.[162]

The following year, 2008, was far less active. It saw only a single attack that fell into the fifth Baleian category, namely a suicide-attack conducted against an anti-Taliban tribal jerga that met in Afghanistan. However, 2009 was a fairly prolific year for al-Qaida inspired extremists operating in the United States. They were responsible for six total events. Three of them were

Finton, another convert, who hoped to bomb federal buildings, but who never posed a meaningful threat, because his al-Qaida _ontact' was an undercover law enforcement officer.[164] A similar plot took place in Dallas, TX, where Hosam Maher Husein Smadi, a Saudi student studying in the US, plotted to bomb the Fountain Place skyskrapper, only to learn that he was also the target of an FBI sting.[165] However, 2009 also saw a particularly deadly al-Qaida inspired event: the Fort Hood shooting, in which Nidal Malik Hasan, a Major serving in the Army medical corps as a psychiatrist, committed fratricide at a Texas Army post, killing thirteen people and wounding another 29, before members of the post's security detail disabled him.[166]

By comparison, 2010 was a light year; it contained only two attacks that fell into the fifth Baleian category. However, both of these continued the pattern of Western-based attacks evidenced in the pervious year. The first of these events was a plot against the Washington, D.C., Metro Rail, which like the Finton and Smadi's efforts was another law enforcement sting, this time aimed at Farooque Ahmed, a naturalized U.S. citizen of Pakistani birth, who was aggrieved by the war in Afghanistan.[167] The second event was the 2010 Stockholm bombing, in which Taimour Abdulwahab al-Abdaly, an Iraqi-born resident of Luton, England, attempted to target sites around Stockholm in retribution for a Swedish satirist's role in creating the infamous Muhammad cartoons. However, technical errors caused al-Abdaly's explosive devices to detonate early, killing him instead of his intended victims.[168]

Given that Western events account for the majority of events in the fifth Baleian category, there is a temptation to assume that al-Qaida's ideological message has some sort of special resonance with Western Muslims. However, such an assumption would be misplaced. Instead, the quality of data on events based in the West is typically of greater breadth and depth than that available on non-Western attacks. This condition, which owes in no small part to the preponderance of court documents available from trials of those indicted for Islamist-motivated terrorism, dictates that it is often possible to code Western jihadists' ideological ties with a level of specificity that cannot be achieved when studying extremists hailing from othe parts of the world.

These data limitations make it difficult to ascribe much meaning to quantitative characterizations of the fifth Baleian category. Therefore, the eighth chapter uses case study to explore the nature and extent of ties that al-Qaida holds to so-called al-Qaida inspired attacks. Specifically, the chapter examines the paths to radicalism, the extent of planning, the sources of financial support, the sources logistical supplies, and the extent of training for individuals involved in three events that were conducted in the United States by individuals with ideological ties to al-Qaida. These events are: the 2007 plot against Fort Dix in New Jersey, the 2009 shooting at an Army recruiting center in Little Rock, Arkansas, and the 2009 shooting at Fort Hood in Texas.

With these broad trends in each category now established, the remainder of the analysis turns its attention to the cases singled-out by the preceding sections.

4.0 AL-QAIDA'S DEVOLVING CAPACITY TO WAGE TERRORISM IN THE NON-WESTERN WORLD

Because the frequency analysis conducted by the previous chapter does not consider the scale or nature of events, it is incapable of describing qualitative changes over time within each of the Baleian categories. Therefore, this chapters adopts the perspective of structured-focused comparison to in an attempt to assess how al-Qaida's involvement in events in the first Baleian category, which contains non-Western attacks and plots in which al-Qaida played a strong functional role, has shifted between 1998, when bin Laden's organization first gained widespread notoriety by bombing a pair of U.S. embassies in East Africa, and 2004, the last year before the quantitative model attributed a sharp drop-off in the organization's strong role in a non-Western attacks.

A number of analysts have argued that al-Qaida has shown tremendous adaptive capability during this period. For example, in 2004, Bruce Hoffman argued that the organization's leadership "engineered nothing short of a stunning transformation of Al Qaeda from the more or less unitary, near bureaucratic entity it one had been to something more akin to an ideology."[1] Similarly, in 2008, Reid Sawyer and Michael Foster, a pair of researchers affiliated with West Point's Combating Terrorism Center, concluded that "Al Qaeda is stronger and more resilient than at any time since 2001 due to its ability to adapt, innovate, and reconfigure its resources in response to a hostile counterterrorism environment."[2] More recent assessments have seconded these opinions; for example, in 2011, Bruce Riedel of the Brookings Institute stated that "Al Qaeda has always been a remarkably adaptive organization,"[3] and Norman Cigar, a Department of Defense Minerva Fellow at the Marine Corps University, concluded that "Al-Qaida is an adaptive organization and has exhibited the ability to learn from experience."[4]

While these authors are correct to note that the bin Laden's organization has fundamentally changed during the course of its history, evidence drawn from al-Qaida's non-Western operations suggests that their shared viewpoint misstates the nature of the organization's transformation. A comparison of the 1998 embassy bombings in East Africa, the 2002 Mombasa attacks on Israeli-linked targets, and a 2004 string of attacks conducted by a single operational group in-and-around Karachi suggest that al-Qaida's capabilities have devolved rather than adapted. The average quality of the organization's operatives has waned over time, and in each subsequent case, al-Qaida has been able to provide demonstrably less organizational-level support to the operatives acting in the organization's name. Consequently, al-Qaida's operatives have had to become more self-reliant to accomplish attacks, but the scale of their capabilities has declined in proportion to the extent of support they have received from al-Qaida.

This chapter contains four sections following this introduction. The first three discuss each of the cases mentioned above in succession, before the fourth offers some brief conclusions. In order to ensure even cross-comparison, each of the cases also follows the same internal

4.1 THE 1998 BOMBINGS OF THE UNITED STATES EMBASSIES IN KENYA AND TANZANIA

On the morning of August 7, 1998, in Runda Estates, a comfortable suburb located north of Nairobi, Kenya,[5] three men made final preparations to attack the U.S. Embassy located in the city's downtown. Two of them, Jihad Mohammed Abdou Ali (a.k.a. Azzam) and Mohamed Rashed Daoud al-_Owhali, were young Saudis who were slated to die in the attack as suicide-bombers. The third man, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed (a.k.a. Harun), a native of the Comoros Islands, served in a supervisory capacity; his job was to make certain that Ali and al-_Owhali followed through on the attack.[6]

Their plan was fairly simple. Fazul would guide the bombers from the safe house to the embassy by driving a lead-vehicle, a small white pick-up, through Nairobi's confusing streets. Ali and al-_Owhali would follow in a Toyota box-delivery truck that had been filled with approximately one ton of ground TNT and aluminum powder. When they reached the rear of the embassy, al-_Owhali would leap from the truck's passenger seat with pistol in hand and would force the gate guard to lower the barricade blocking the embassy compound's rear entrance, so that Ali could drive the truck as close to the building as possible before detonating, thereby ensuring maximum damage. If Ali was unable to trigger the explosion using the electric switch hidden in the cab of the vehicle, al-_Owhali was supposed to throw open the truck's rear door and use one of the several homemade grenades he carried with him to detonate the bomb manually.[7]

In practice, the plan nearly fell apart. Fazul led the team to the embassy without incident, but during the course of the ride from the safe house, al-_Owhali had removed his jacket, and since his pistol was hidden in a coat pocket, he leapt from the bomb-truck without his primary weapon. However, he was still able to scare away the gate guards by detonating one of the four pipe-bomb grenades he had stuffed into his belt. With the plan back on track, he then lowered the barricade, allowing Ali, who used al-_Owhali's left-behind pistol to fire wildly at the embassy from the driver's side window of the truck, to pass through the gate unimpeded. However, al-_Owhali was unable to reunite with Ali in the melee. The failed suicide-bomber escaped from the ensuing blast with minor injuries,[8] but 213 others were no so lucky and perished[9] when Ali's explosion reduced the embassy to a pile of rubble and scattered debris for nearly half a mile.[10] Nearly 5,000 more were injured.[11]

A similar scene unfolded 420 miles to the southeast, in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. In the city's Iala district, a working-class neighborhood of unpaved roads and cinder-block houses,[12] Hamden Khalif Allah Awad, an Egyptian who his compatriots had dubbed "Ahmed the German" because of his fair hair and blue eyes,[13] readied himself to suicide-bomb a second American Embassy. His weapon, which was hidden inside of a Nissan refrigerator-truck that had been specially modified for the operation, [14] was similar to the Nairobi device in terms of size, but differed in construction and contained several cylinders of explosive gas in addition to its payload of TNT.[15] Moreover, unlike his counterpart in Kenya, Awad had no co-pilot or supervisor.

His only help that morning came from Khalfan Khamis Mohammed, a Tanzanian graduate of al-Qaida's Afghan training camps, who served as one of the attack team's local fixers, and who had been tasked by the operation's now-departed leadership to stay behind and serve as Awad's translator in the days immediately preceding the attack, since the suicide-bomber spoke no Swahili. Perhaps because Awad made his final approach to the embassy alone, his bombing was not as effective as the Nairobi attack. The gate guards prevented him from pulling his truck alongside the building as Ali had, and only 11 people, all of them Tanzanians, died when Awad detonated his weapon near the embassy's gate.[16]

Although al-_Owhali's blunder and Awad's lack of support very nearly caused these twin bombings to fail at the last minute, the Nairobi and Dar es Salaam attacks ultimately tell the story of an organizational success that was years in the making. Al-Qaida participated in every step of the long chain of events that preceded the events of August 7, 1998. High-level members of the organization were involved in the strategic and tactical planning of the attacks, the distribution of funds to support the attacks, the requisition of logistical supplies needed to conduct the attacks, and the training of the key personnel involved in the attacks. A small handful of untrained locals served as low-level functionaries responsible for some of the unpleasant grunt work that preceded the attacks, but these individuals worked in ignorance of the impending bombings and were manipulated by members of bin Laden's organization. In short, the team responsible for the first attacks that garnered al-Qaida wide-spread international attention displayed aspects of formal hierarchical structure, rather than a diffuse network structure.

4.1.1 PLANNING

Al-Qaida began to conceptualize the embassy bombings as early as 1993, when bin Laden dispatched Ali Mohamed, a former Egyptian Army officer who had also served as an enlisted man in the U.S. Army since the 1980s,[17] to conduct surveillance of a series of targets in Nairobi that, according to Mohamed, were chosen ~~to~~ retaliate against the United States for its involvement in Somalia."[18] Mohamed sketched maps, took photographs, and even wrote a formal report describing the buildings that housed USAID's Kenyan offices, the U.S. Agricultural Office in Nairobi, and the American Embassy. In early 1994, when he dropped-off the dossiers in Khartoum, where al-Qaida was then based, Usama bin Laden and Ali al-Rashidi, an Egyptian who commanded the logistical support cell al-Qaida already had in place in East Africa and who was better known by his nom de guerre Abu Ubaidah al-Banshiri,[19] reviewed the documents personally. Mohamed claims that while studying photos of the embassy compound bin Laden even pointed ~~to~~ where a truck could go as a suicide bomber."[20]

The strength of the East African cell also began to grow during this period. In addition to al-Banshiri, who was already living in Mwanza, Tanzania, under the name Adel Habib and who had married into a local family,[21] a handful of other al-Qaida members were already established in Nairobi. Bin Laden soon bolstered their numbers by dispatching an influx of new personnel to the region. For example, Wadih el-Hage, a Lebanese-born American citizen who converted to Islam from Catholicism as a teen and worked alongside bin Laden to provide logistical support to foreign mujahideen during the Soviet-Afghan War,[22] arrived in Nairobi in 1994 from Khartoum, where el-Hage had served as bin Laden's business secretary.[23] Similarly, Fazul Abdul Mohammed, who guided Ali and al-_Owhali to the embassy in 1998, first arrived in Kenya in 1994[24] and began working for el-Hage.[25]

While these interactions demonstrate that al-Qaida was enhancing its strategic capacity in East Africa in the mid-1990s, the evidence suggests that bin Laden's organization had not yet decided to attack the embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam. Indeed, al-Qaida was still scouting other targets. In late 1994, during a meeting held in the back of el-Hage's Nairobi home, Muhammad Atef (a.k.a. Abu Hafs al-Masri), who was one of al-Qaida's founders[26] and a high-ranking member the organization's military committee,[27] instructed Ali Mohamed, the same man who conducted the earlier surveillance on American interests in Nairobi, to reconnoiter –American, British, French, and Israeli targets in Senegal."[28]

Beyond its indecisiveness, al-Qaida's efforts in East Africa were stalled when the organization suffered a series of misfortunes that greatly hampered the organization's capabilities. In 1995, bin Laden's relationship with Hassan al-Turabi, the autocratic ruler of the Sudan, began to deteriorate, and al-Qaida lost its primary base of operations and suffered heavy financial losses when the organization was expelled from the Sudan the following year.[29] Abu Ubaida al-Banshiri, who continued to head al-Qaida's East African operations, also died in 1996, when he drowned in a ferry accident on Lake Victoria, thereby depriving the organization's East African contingent of its primary leader.[30] Early the following year, al-Qaida suffered its first known defection, when Madani al-Tayyib, who once sat on the organization's financial committee, turned himself in to Saudi authorities, sending the organization's leadership into a mild panic.[31] In short, these factors locked the organization into a holding pattern, and al-Qaida was unable to make much progress on its East African operations between 1995 and early 1997.

However, during this period, al-Qaida's leadership also made an important strategic decision that served to focus the organization's long-simmering disdain for America. Specifically, in 1996, bin Laden issued a fatwa (religious decree) that openly declared war on the United States. His rambling statement, which first appeared in a London-based Arabic newspaper, took particular offense to the deployment of American troops to protect Saudi Arabia from the Saddam Hussein regime. Bin Laden called the presence of non-Muslim soldiers in the birthplace of Islam —one of the worst catastrophes to befall Muslims since the death of the Prophet," and asked Muslims the world-over to join his followers –in their jihad against their enemies and yours, the Israelis and the Americans."[32] Thus, despite suffering setbacks, the organization had a clear long-term goal, namely eliminating American influence from the Muslim world.

This strategic policy soon trickled-down to the tactical level. In February 1997, Wadih el-Hage traveled to Afghanistan to meet with Atef and bin Laden. They instructed him to militarize al-Qaida's East African cell, which had previously served primarily in a logistical capacity that supported the broader organization. When el-Hage returned to Nairobi, preparations for the embassy bombings began in earnest. Initially, el-Hage played a leading role in organizing the attacks, but his involvement was short lived.[33]

The U.S. intelligence community had grown concerned that bin Laden was a financier of terrorism, and soon began to suspect that el-Hage was the dissident Saudi's emissary to Kenya. Within several weeks of el-Hage's return from Afghanistan, the FBI tapped his phones. The Bureau did not overhear any overt discussion of the forthcoming bombings, but el-Hage's conversations were suspicious enough to merit additional investigation, so agents conducted a search of el-Hage's Nairobi home in August of 1997. Although they found nothing that spoke directly to the embassy plot, the incident spooked el-Hage. He fled Kenya and returned to the United States alongside his American-born wife and their children, only to be subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury when he landed in New York. El-Hage protected the operation by lying through his teeth about the extent of his involvement in jihad and the nature of his relationship with bin Laden, but he was now effectively cut-off from the East African operation.[34] Consequently, another man played the lead role in the tactical planning of the embassy bombings.

According to the FBI, Abdullah Ahmed Abdullah (a.k.a. Saleh), an Egyptian who al-Qaida had dispatched to Mogadishu in 1993 to advise Somali warlords in their fight against U.N. Peacekeepers,[35] held overall authority for the East African bombings and was in close contact with bin Laden.[36] He delegated significant responsibility for the logistics of the attacks to Fazul,[37] K.K. Mohammed,[38] and Sheikh Ahmed Salim Swedan (a.k.a. Ahmed the Tall), a Kenyan native who had worked alongside Abdullah during the conflict in Somalia,[39] but Abdullah also seems to have micro-managed several aspects of the attacks' tactical details. For example, he set the attack for Friday morning, on the logic that observant Muslims would then be at the mosque for Friday prayers and thus would escape injury in the attack.[40]

His subordinates had little say in this or other matters, because Abdullah seems to have practiced strict "need to know" protocols; for example, al-Owhali, who road shotgun in the Nairobi bomb truck, was not told of the existence of the Tanzanian bombing-team or his specific target in Kenya until August 3, only four days prior to the attack.[41] Then, shortly before Abdullah and the majority of al-Qaida's other personnel left the region in advance of the attacks,[42] the team-leader guided al-_Owhali though some last minute surveillance of the embassy in Nairobi, in order to ensure that the suicide-operative understood every detail of the plan.[43] From that point forward, Fazul, Ali, and al-_Owhali were essentially on their own in Nairobi, while Awad and K.K. Mohammed were in analogous circumstances in Dar es Salaam.

4.1.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Al-Qaida's logistical presence in East Africa preceded even Ali Mohamed's first reconnaissance trip. As early as 1992, Khalid al-Fawwaz, who once headed the bin Laden-funded Abu Bakr Sadeek training camp outside Khost, Afghanistan, had set-up shop in Nairobi. He established a car business and import firm named Asma Limited, after his daughter, and used the business to generate income to support al-Qaida's East African operations. However, he also received regular transfusions of cash, which couriers dispatched by bin Laden delivered from Khartoum,[44] so Asma Limited was likely equal parts legitimate business and front operation to launder these funds.

However, al-Fawwaz's involvement with the East African support cell was cut short when Kenyan authorities arrested him and another al-Qaida member on vague charges of passport violations in late 1994. Given that Abu Ubaidah al-Banshiri was able to secure their release by having a lawyer pay a $3,000 bribe to the police, it seems that the arresting officers may have just been fishing for a pay day. Regardless of its underlying reasons, the arrest spooked al-Fawwaz. He departed for the Sudan shortly thereafter,[45] and then ultimately made his way to London, where he was arrested on terrorism charges in late 1998.[46]

Wadih el-Hage, the same man who conveyed bin Laden's decision to militarize the East African cell, took al-Fawwaz's place. After arriving in Nairobi in 1994, el-Hage established Help Africa People, a charity which provided identification cards, and likely also employment, to several of al-Qaida's operatives in the region. Prior to his death, Abu Ubaidah al-Banshiri served on the organization's board of directors.[47] Similarly, Fazul and Mohamed Odeh, a Jordanian graduate of al-Qaida's Afghan camps who served as yet another advisor to Somali warlords during the Mogadishu conflict before joining the embassy-bombing team in a logistical capacity,[48] were listed as officers of the charity.[49] Thus, a direct chain connected key members of the attack team to al-Qaida's earliest emissaries to East Africa, and the organization played a clear role in providing team members with a façade of legitimacy that justified these foreigners' presence in the region.

Al-Qaida also played a demonstrable role in generating the revenue streams that supported the attack-team. Following the model that it had established by creating al-Fawwaz's now defunct Asma Limited, al-Qaida founded a business that generated profits which supported the organization's East African operations.[50] Specifically, in 1997, Mohamed Odeh established a fishing business in Mombasa, Kenya, with donations he received from two sources: an unidentified charity, which was likely el-Hage's Help Africa People; and al-Haramain

Foundation,[51] a Saudi-based charity that the U.S. Department of Treasury later sanctioned for its financial support of both al-Qaida[52] and militants involved in the Chechen jihad.[53]

With plausible covers for its operatives in place and a source of revenue secured, al-Qaida turned its attention toward the acquisition of the materiel necessary to conduct the bombings. Fazul and Khalfan Khamis Mohammed secured the safe houses where the bombs were later constructed. Fazul rented the house at 43 Runda Estates outside Nairobi in May 1998, for a cost of about 840 USD per month. However, because he was not a Kenyan citizen, Fazul was unable to sign the lease and asked Sikander Juma, a friend of his who was also the brother of the deceased al-Banshiri's wife, to serve as his proxy.[54] In June, in Dar es Salaam, K.K. Mohammed contacted a real estate broker who helped him to find the Iala house, which he and an associate—likely Awad, the suicide-operative in the Dar attack—rented for about 100 USD per month, paying the entire year's lease up-front in cash.[55]

These homes shared some similar characteristics. Both were removed from the city center and sat in sleepy, unassuming neighborhoods, and both were surrounded by high walls, which served to conceal the plotters' actions for public view.[56] Indeed, K.K. Mohammed communicated his desire for a walled compound to the real estate broker who helped him to find the Iala house,[57] but given that burglaries and home invasions are worryingly commonplace in East Africa, there was nothing overtly suspicious about Mohammed's requirements. Even modest homes in Kenya and Tanzania boast high concrete walls, the tops of which are typically rimmed by razor wire or broken bottles cemented in place, to preclude prowlers from attempting to scale the barricade.[58] Thus, finding safe houses that met the attack teams' needs for privacy was not an especially difficult challenge.

After acquiring the safe houses, the team next secured the vehicles used to deliver the explosions to the embassies. In July, Swedan purchased the Nairobi bomb-truck, a Toyota Dyna, second-hand from an acquaintance who used the vehicle to haul livestock and feed to his poultry farm outside Mombasa. Swedan paid the equivalent of 10,000 USD for the vehicle, which was a curious price, since the owner had purchased the vehicle for approximately 3,100 USD only two months earlier. As Swedan never turned-up to fill-out the paperwork necessary to transfer the vehicle's title and registration, it seems obvious that he was willing to pay a substantial premium to avoid routing his purchase through official channels. Moreover, since Swedan initially attempted to pay the seller in U.S. currency, only to be rebuffed because the truck's owner was afraid the bills might be counterfeit,[59] it seems clear that the plotters had an additional source of revenue beyond Mohammed Odeh's fishing business. The record contains no specific [59] As Swedan attempted to pay the seller of the truck using U.S. dollars, it was not necessary to convert the cost of the vehicle. However, the seller was unwilling to accept dollars, so Swedan had to run to the money changer to pay the purchase price in local currency. transactions, but given that al-Fawwaz received cash from bin Laden via courier during his time in Nairobi, it is reasonable to speculate that Swedan obtained funds in an analogous manner.

These patterns largely repeated in Dar es Salaam, where later that July, Swedan was also involved in the purchase of the refrigerated Nissan truck that served as the delivery vehicle for the Tanzanian bomb. Alongside Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani, a Tanzanian who served as a sort of local fixer, he negotiated to buy the truck for about 6,500 USD. The al-Qaida operatives again used some U.S. currency in the transaction, paying the seller a $500 deposit in American bills, which suggests that this purchase also received some measure of financial support from abroad. As in Nairobi, the al-Qaida operatives again failed to turn-up to fill-out the paperwork necessary to officially transfer ownership.[60]

However, the Dar truck differed from the Nairobi vehicle in at least one important way: it required modification to meet the operation's needs. Specifically, the team was not satisfied with the refrigerator truck's payload specifications. Swedan and Ghailani purchased it because it was apparently the only vehicle that they could acquire under anonymous circumstances, forcing the team to make-do.[61] Towards those ends, K.K. Mohammed posed as a fish wholesaler who needed to reinforce and subdivide the interior compartment of the truck to allow him to carry bins of different fish to market and paid a local welder a small fee to modify the vehicle to accommodate the weight and design of the bomb.[62]

However, the bomb-trucks were not the only vehicles that the attack teams needed in order to complete their operation. The operatives in Dar and Nairobi also used a pair of smaller passenger vehicles as fleet cars that team members could use to complete errands in support of the operation. In Dar, a white Suzuki Samurai, a small jeep-like SUV, filled this role. K.K. Mohammed bought it in June, even before he had secured the Iala house.[63] In Nairobi, the same white pick-up that Fazul drove as the lead-vehicle on the day of the bombings served as the team's fleet car. It seems that the small truck was repurposed rather than purchased specifically in preparation for the attack. Fahad Ally Msalam, a local Kenyan in his early 20s who assisted in the attacks' logistical preparations, had purchased the truck as his personal vehicle well before the operation began.[64]

The attackers' communication needs were similarly commonplace and were met using standard commercial technology. In Dar, Ghailani, the same man who assisted in the purchase of the bomb-truck, acquired a mobile phone that the Tanzanian group used to communicate with their counterparts in Kenya. Given that the last call made on the phone took place less than an hour prior to the coordinated strike on August 7, it seems fairly clear that Awad, the suicide-operative in the Dar es Salaam strike, received his final orders via this device.[65] Meanwhile, the Kenyan group communicated with individuals abroad by making collect calls from Runda Estates house. The bulk of these routed to Ahmed al-Hazza, a friend of al-ʿOwhali's who fought beside him in Afgahnistan.[66] It remains unclear if these calls were purely social in nature, but al-Hazza may have also served as a cut-out that communicated decisions made by al-Qaida's Afghanistan-based leadership to the Kenyan cell, which then relayed information to the Tanzanian group.

Explosives, the most important resource in any bombing attack, are more difficult to trace. In 1996, in an apparent effort to demonstrate his value to al-Qaida, Fahad Ally Msalam, the same young Kenyan who donated his pick-up to the Nairobi operation, gave Mohamed Odeh, one of the Afghan veterans who spent time in Somalia, a block of TNT and a blasting cap. Msalam then bragged that such materials were easy to obtain in Tanzania, and although Odeh remained somewhat mistrustful of the eager youngster, he relayed information on the availability of explosives in East Africa to al-Qaida's higher-ups.[67] The organization's leadership must have approved, because in the latter part of the following year, Msalam was ordered to acquire larger quantities of TNT on al-Qaida's behalf. With the help of Ghailani, the same local fixer who helped Swedan purchase the refrigerator truck, Msalam paid cash to buy large quantities of TNT from a mining firm in Arusha, Tanzania. As the date of the attack approached, the pair augmented these supplies by purchasing the cylinders of oxygen and acetylene gas used in the Dar bomb from a commercial supplier,[68] which likely had few, if any, restrictions on the materials' sale, as they are widely used in construction welding. Msalam and K.K. Mohammed then spent the bulk of July shuttling these explosives and other supplies to the teams' safe houses in the fleet vehicles.[69]

It is also clear who played the attacks' most important logistical role: bomb-maker. Msalam, K.K. Mohammed, and other team members were involved in unskilled work, such as grinding TNT (the Dar team used a hand-cranked flour mill, which K.K. Mohammed cleaned and then presented to his sister as a gift),[70] but the skilled electrical work necessary to connect the bombs various components was largely the work of one man, an Egyptian named Muhsin Musa Matwalli Atwah (a.k.a. Abdel Rahman), who once served as an explosives instructor at al-Qaida's Sadeek Camp near Khost, Afghanistan, and was also a veteran of al-Qaida's foray into Somalia in the early 1990s.[71] With some assistance from Fazul, Atwah built the Nairobi bomb during a ten-day period that concluded about two weeks prior to the bombing.[72] Atwah then traveled to Tanzania, where the attack team's less-skilled members had already loaded the refrigerator-truck with TNT and cylinders of gas, and completed the wiring of the Dar es Salaam bomb, before fleeing East Africa for Karachi.[73]

4.1.3 TRAINING

As with logistics, al-Qaida's training ties to the embassy bombings began years earlier. The attacks' tactical leader, Abdullah, held the longest ties to bin Laden's organization of any of the men directly involved in the operational phase of the attack. Following a brief career as a professional soccer player in Egypt, Abdullah became involved in Egyptian Islamic Jihad, and encountered several of the men who would later become al-Qaida members while fighting as a foreign mujahid during the later days of the Soviet-Afghan War. It is not clear whether or not Abdullah was a founding member of bin Laden's organization in 1988, but by 1991, Abduallah held a formal position with the new group, serving as the head of al-Qaida's media committee.[74] When the Somali conflict broke-out in the early 1990s, he was also among the men that bin Laden dispatched to Mogadishu.[75] Therefore, Abdullah was already a well-seasoned jihadist by the time that he led the East African attack.

Two other members of the attack team had nearly comparable tenure in al-Qaida. Mohamed Odeh, whose fishing business provided some of the funding that underwrote al-Qaida's operational expenses in East Africa, formally joined al-Qaida in 1992, but his path to radicalism began six years earlier, via audio cassette. In 1986, while an engineering student at Far Eastern University in the Philippines, Odeh began listening to the recorded sermons of Abdullah Azzam, a Palestinian preacher who served as one of bin Laden's early ideological mentors. Odeh had become fully radicalized by the time he was preparing to graduate four years later, and when his father wired him a thousand dollars to help with expenses in his final semester, Odeh instead used the money to fund his way to Afghanistan. He spent two months in basic training at al-Qaida's Farouq Camp and then briefly served as a medic on the front lines of the Afghan civil war, before obtaining more specialized training in urban assault tactics at al-Qaida's Jihad Wal Camp. In March 1992, Odeh swore bayat to bin Laden,[76] and then received a third stint of training, this time at Sadeek Camp, where the new al-Qaida member studied explosives under Atwah, the bomb-maker who wired both the Dar es Salaam and Nairobi bombs.[77] Thus, one of the attacks' key logistical supporters and the attacks' key technical expert had been part of bin Laden's organization for nearly as long the attacks' tactical leader.

Like Odeh, Fazul's experience with radicalism began at school and followed a similar timeline. While he was still a teenager living in the Comoros Islands, Fazul studied at a religious school funded by al-Haramain Foundation. Based on his scholastic and religious acumen, he then won a scholarship to study in Pakistan in the early 1990s, at which point al-Qaida formally recruited him.[78] Fazul underwent training in the organization's Afghan camps in 1992, alongside Jihad Ali, the driver of the Nairobi bomb-truck, and under the tutelage of Ali Mohamed, the former Egyptian army officer who conducted the early surveillance of American targets in Nairobi.[79]

These trainees' paths then diverged. Fazul returned to Africa in 1993 to help train the Somali fighters then targeting U.N. Peacekeepers in Mogadishu,[80] and later that same year, he began reporting to Abu Ubaidah al-Banshiri,[81] the founding member of al-Qaida who served as the chief of the organization's East African operations until his untimely drowning. However, Fazul's involvement with Somali militants seems to have continued beyond the initial battle for Mogadishu, because el-Hage sent the Comorian jihadist to Somalia multiple times in 1995 under the guises of "relief work" for Help Africa People.[82] Thus, by the time preparations for the embassy bombings began in earnest, Fazul's experience rivaled that of attack team's other prominent members.

Meanwhile, Jihad Ali bounced back and forth between Afghanistan and his native Saudi Arabia. In 1997, while working as a medic of sorts in a bin Laden-affiliated guest house, Ali first encountered Mohammed al-Owhali, who would later ride shotgun when Ali drove the bomb-truck to the embassy in Nairobi. Al-_Owhali had recently graduated from al-Qaida's Khaldan Camp, before receiving permission from bin Laden to fight for the Taliban, which was then losing the battle for the Afghan capital of Kabul to their rivals in the Northern Alliance. Perhaps because he had contracted the tuberculosis that brought him to the guesthouse while fighting on the front lines, al-_Owhali was receptive when Ali told him that there were other, greater forms of jihad, such as martyrdom operations against the West.[83]

However, Ali was not merely a cheerleader or a nurse; he made an active attempt at jihad the following year. Alongside his cousin, Abdul Rahim Mohammed Hussein Abda Al-Nasheri, who later played a key role in the 2000 bombing of the U.S.S. Cole,[84] Ali attempted (and failed) to smuggle Stinger missiles across the Saudi border, "for use against an unspecified military target."[85] Thus, Ali and al-_Owhali, who were both slated to die in the Nairobi attack, were also seasoned operatives who held practical, front-line experience in jihad.

Hamden Khalif Allah Awad, who served as the suicide-driver in the Tanzanian bombing, held comparable experience. By the time that al-_Owhali arrived in Afghanistan in 1997, Awad served as a trainer at the Jihad Wal Camp, another of the organization's training facilities near Khost. As he had with Ali, al-_Owhali formed a friendship with Awad.[86] Thus, all of the men who were supposed to die in the East African attacks were bound not only by their experience in al-Qaida, but also by affinity bonds.

K.K. Mohammed, who played an important logistical role in the Tanzanian blast and served as Awad's translator in the days immediately preceding the attack, also first became involved in al-Qaida in the mid-1990s. His path to radicalism began in 1990, when he was still a teenager. Although his family was not especially religious, Mohammed found solace in Islam when he moved from the tiny island of Pemba, which lies about 50 miles north of Zanzibar in the Indian Ocean, to urban Dar es Salaam to begin work in his brother's store. A mutual friend soon introduced the newly-devout Mohammed to Fahad All Msalam, who later served as the embassy bombings' other key logistical procurer, and who was then visiting Tanzania from his native Kenya. Msalam's religious zeal was apparently infectious; he convinced Mohammed that it was his duty to travel to Afghanistan to fight in support of the mujahideen who were fighting against other factions to establish a true Islamic state.[87] Consequently, in 1994, K.K. Mohammed obtained training in Manakando Camp, before returning to East African the following year and becoming yet another instructor in al-Qaida's burgeoning Somalian operation.[88]

Interestingly, for all his zeal, Msalam did not immediately follow Mohammed to Afghanistan. The aspiring Kenyan jihadists did not train until 1996, when he went through a basic course alongside Sheikh Ahmed Swedan, who had been recruited into al-Qaida earlier that year by Mohamed Odeh.[89] Thus, like the attacks' suicide-operatives and the team's tactical leaders, three of the men responsible for acquiring the materiel necessary to conduct the embassy bombings were graduates of al-Qaida's Afghan training facilities.

Ahmed Khalfan Ghailani, who assisted in the procurement of the explosives and the Dar vehicle, offers the sole exception to this pattern. Prior to the bombings, he had spent no time in the Afghan camps.[90] He seems to have been brought into the plot by K.K. Mohammed, the other Tanzanian involved in the plot, with whom he had apparently formed a friendship during their overlapping stints in Dar es Salaam.[91] However, as a reward for his assistance in the embassy bombings, Ghailani received training in Farouq Camp after the 1998 attacks, and then served as bin Laden's personal cook for a time, before receiving additional training in document forgery and beginning a career making false passports to facilitate al-Qaida operatives' clandestine travel.[92] He continued to serve in this capacity until he was captured in 2004.[93]

Ultimately, this evidence demonstrates that the vast bulk of the men involved in the embassy bombings had long association with al-Qaida. All but one of the key team members involved in the East African attacks had spent time in the organization's Afghan camps as either a student or an instructor, and several of the men had gained practical experience by fighting on the front lines of the Afghan civil war or by advising Somali clansmen during their confrontation with U.N. Peacekeepers during the early 1990s. In short, the attack team was comprised of seasoned jihadists.

4.1.4 SUMMATION

The patterns that existed within al-Qaida at the time of its first widely known attack can be stated succinctly. Although there was some fluidity in reporting relationships, as exhibited by the persistent personnel turnovers the organization experienced in Nairobi throughout the mid-1990s, al-Qaida was demonstrably hierarchical. High-ranking leaders planned at the strategic level by setting broad policies, as best demonstrated by bin Laden's 1996 declaration of war on the United States. These strategic leaders also made decisions on target selection; bin Laden and Abu Ubaidah al-Banshiri singled-out the American embassy in Nairobi as early as 1994. Once broad resources were in place, middle-managers handled the bulk of the tactical details. Until the FBI's probe scared him out of East Africa, el-Hage was responsible for some financial issues and for ensuring that the attack team appeared to have legitimate reasons to be in the country. Odeh and his fishing business were responsible for generating a substantial portion of the finances that supported the attack, and as demonstrated by his involvement with Swedan, Odeh also recruited on al-Qaida's behalf. Swedan and Fazul seem to have taken responsibility for spending the money Odeh generated and met the bulk of the attacks' materiel requirements, often by delegating tasks to to K.K. Mohammed, Msalam, and Ghailani. Abdullah planned how to use these resources at a tactical level and tightly managed information to ensure the security of the operation. Atwah then served as the operations' technical specialist and used his unique expertise to wire the explosive devices, before Ali, Awadh, and al-_Owhali served as the pointy end of al-Qaida's spear by filling (or, in al-_Owhali's case, attempting to fill) the role of suicide-operatives. With the sole exception of Ghailani, all of these men had been formally trained by bin Laden's organization. Thus, al-Qaida members were intimately involved in every aspect of the attack from its conceptual phase through its execution. However, this pattern would not repeat when al-Qaida conducted its next large-scale attack on East Africa by bombing Israeli-linked targets in Mombasa, Kenya, in 2002.

4.2 THE 2002 MOMBASA ATTACKS

On the morning of November 26, 2002, two young men, Fumo Mohamed Fumo and Haruni Bamusa, readied themselves to die in a suicide-bombing. Both were Kenyans and neither had any previous experience in jihad, but their target, the Paradise Hotel, spoke to the Islamist beliefs the men had adopted. Because it was located in scenic Kikambala, a lush resort located along Kenya's Indian Ocean coast, and was just a short flight from Tel Aviv, the Paradise was popular with Israeli tourists seeking a tropical getaway. Thus, Fumo and Bamusa believed that striking the hotel constituted a blow against the people who had usurped territory that rightfully belonged to Palestinian Muslims. Armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles and a Tokarev pistol to ward-off security guards, the men drove an explosives-laden Mitsubishi Pajero SUV alongside the hotel and detonated the bomb just before 10.00am local time. The explosion killed 15 people, only three of whom were Israelis, and injured approximately 80 more.[94]

Minutes earlier, two other young, Kenyan jihadists, Issa Osman Issa and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, had launched a pair of shoulder-fired 9k32m Strela-2 surface-to-air missiles at a Boeing 757 departing from nearby Moi airport, but both missed their target. As the Tel Aviv-bound flight was operated by Israeli-owned Arkia Airlines, it seems clear that Issa and Nabhan shared the motivations of the hotel-bombers.[95] Had the attack on the airline gone according to plan,

Some sources attribute this role to Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, but as the Omar statement is closest to the event, its description of the assailants involved seems most likely to be accurate. For Issa and Nabhan's role, see the Omar Statement. For the make of the missiles, see "Qaida chameleon' seen behind bombings" and Stefan Tafrov (chairman), Report of the Panel of Experts on Somalia pursuant to Security Council resolution 1474 (2003), November 4, 2003, pp. 29-30. about 200 passengers would have died,[96] to say nothing of casualties on the ground, and the 2003 attacks would have caused a loss of life comparable to the 1998 bombings.

As with the embassy attacks, al-Qaida's hand was evident in the near-simultaneous strikes on the Paradise Hotel and Arkia Airlines. High-ranking members of bin Laden's organization planned the attack, and it even involved some of the same operatives as the Nairobi bombing. For example, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who had guided the Nairobi-bombers through the city's hectic streets as they made their way to the American embassy, played a leading role in recruiting the 2003 attack team and financing its attack. However, the Mombasa-Kikambala attacks also differed from the 1998 bombings in significant ways. On average, the 2003 operatives did not benefit from the same degree of formal terror training as their predecessors in Nairobi in Dar es Salaam. Similarly, al-Qaida's organizational involvement in the finance of the 2003 operation was qualitatively different, and the Mombasa-Kikambala team did not benefit from the same type of al-Qaida-financed business that Mohamed Odeh ran to support the 1998 team. Though still clearly working at bin Laden's behest, the 2003 attack team was more independent and far less tied al-Qaida's hierarchy. In short, the organization's involvement in attacks was beginning to become more diffuse, even among those events in which al-Qaida played a strong role, and the quality of the operation suffered accordingly.

4.2.1 PLANNING

Al-Qaida began conceptualizing the Mombasa attacks shortly before 9/11. In September 2001, as the airline hijackers made their final preparations in America, al-Qaida's leadership in Afghanistan gathered in celebration. Bin Laden's 19 year-old son, Mohammed, was marrying the teenage daughter of Muhammad Atef, an influential Egyptian member of al-Qaida's military committee.[97] This event serves as a useful marker for the 2003 Mombasa attacks, because Fazul, who had been in hiding in South Asia since the embassy bombings, did not attend the wedding. Although bin Laden had invited him, the Comorian jihadist declined this honor because he believed it was more important for him to return to Africa to begin preparations for his next attack.[98] It is not clear exactly how far ahead of the wedding Fazul left Afghanistan, but he was gone no later than the end of summer in 2001.

An accomplice of Fazul's, whom Kenyan police later arrested for his involvement in the Mombasa attacks, stated that the Comorian was "in charge of the whole operation,"[99] but he may have had help planning the attack at the strategic level. During the course of his Combatant Status Review Tribunal, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed claimed that he was responsible for 31 distinct terror plots and attacks, including "the bombing of the hotel in Mombasa that is frequented by Jewish travelers via El Al airlines," and "for launching a Russian-made SA-7 surface-to-air missile on El-Al or other Jewish airliner departing from Mombasa."[100] To restate the obvious, the man who masterminded 9/11 claimed that he also conceptualized the 2002 attacks on East Africa.

However, it may be unwise to accept KSM's confession at face value; some pundits posit that KSM assumed responsibility for several terrorist plots in which he lacked meaningful involvement in order to protect co-conspirators still at large, to send American investigators on a wild goose chase, or perhaps simply to placate his own massive ego.[101] Therefore, the full extent of KSM's involvement in the Mombasa operation is unknown, but no evidence has emerged suggesting that he played an active role in the operation at the tactical level, and it is likely telling that he did not know that the target of the airport-attack was Arinka Airlines, not El-Al. At most, it seems that the KSM played a part at the strategic level and was one of the decision makers that selected Jewish interests in East Africa as a broad class of targets.

Beyond KSM's involvement, Abu Talha al-Sudani, who had been involved in al-Qaida since the early 1990s and who worked in a number of the businesses that bin Laden established during his time in the Sudan, may have played a substantial role in planning the Mombasa attacks. Specifically, in an autobiography that was briefly available on jihadist websites in 2008, Fazul claimed that bin Laden had granted Abu Talha a sort of supervisory role in the attack.[102] However, other participants in the attack labeled Abu Talha as the operation's paymaster.[103] Ultimately, it is clear that Abu Talha was a crucial member of the Mombasa team, but without additional information on the specific nature of the vague supervisory role that bin Laden granted him, it would be premature to conclude that Abu Talha oversaw the entire operation at a strategic level.

On the tactical side, much of the planning seems to have been accomplished by the men who actively conducted the attack. According to accomplice testimony, the suicide-bombers who attacked the hotel and the men who fired the rockets at the Israeli airliner all participated in surveillance, presumably of their respective targets. However, beyond these individuals, Fazul seems to have compartmentalized information in much the same manner as Abdullah had during the embassy bombings. For example, Omar Said Omar, who played an important logistical role in the Mombasa operation by hiring an escape boat that would take the surviving conspirators to Somalia after the attack's conclusion, knew only that ~~t~~here was a place which was to be bombed," but held no information on the specific attack sites or the exact timing of the operation. Indeed, he did not learn the full details of the attack until after it concluded, when he received a phone call from the airport attackers following their failed mission.[104]

4.2.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

The money behind the attacks seems to have come from two sources: funds diverted from charity and crime. As with the 1998 attacks, it is likely that al-Haramain Foundation played a role in funding the Mombasa attacks. Specifically, the foundation distributed substantial funds to support the construction of three mosques in the region, but because Aboud Rogo, the local preacher designated as the recipient of the funds, was both a long-term associate of Fazul and a relative of the Comorian jihadist by marriage, it seems reasonable to assume that at least a portion of the funds were diverted to support the cost of the Mombasa operation.[105] Given al-Haramain's well-documented relationship with bin Laden's organization, these interactions demonstrate that al-Qaida likely provided some organizational-level support to the 2002 attacks.

An unusual arrest demonstrated the role that crime played in funding the attacks. A few months before the Mombasa attacks, Kenyan police detained a man for purchasing jewelry using a stolen credit card that he had acquired during a recent car-jacking. The arresting officers led their suspect back to his apartment in search of more stolen goods, or given the corruption that Kenyan police had demonstrated by accepting a bribe to free al-Qaida members from jail in 1994, they may have been in search of a quick bribe. But regardless of the police's motivation, they found a scene of chaos when they arrived at the apartment the suspect claimed was his home. Several women and one mentally handicapped man were inside, and they began a shouting match with the police. The suspect, whom the arresting officers had neglected to handcuff, took advantage of the momentary confusion; he slipped away and rapidly disappeared in the dense labyrinth of narrow alleyways that comprise Mombasa's older neighborhoods. Only later did the arresting officers realize that their robbery suspect was Fazul, who had appeared on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists since the 1998 attacks.[106] Because jewelry purchased with a credit card is easily resold and converted into cash, this incident strongly suggests that a cycle of robbery (to acquire the cards) and fraud (to acquire items for resale) generated additional funds to support the 2002 Mombasa attacks, though the relative scale of Fazul's criminal exploits and al-Haramain's contributions are impossible to determine because currently available information does not describe these interactions in dollar terms.

This second pattern represented a substantial departure from the funding patterns evidenced during the 1998 embassy bombings. By the time of the Mombasa attacks, much of the financial and logistical infrastructure that al-Qaida held in East Africa during and mid 1990s had been dismantled. Like Khalid al-Fawwaz before him, Wadih el-Hage, who led the organization's support network, had been chased out of Nairobi a year prior to the 1998 bombings, and in the days immediately preceding those attacks, al-Qaida had removed its remaining personnel from the region. The investigation that followed the bombings precluded bin Laden's organization from reestablishing itself in the region in the same largely public manner it had in advance of the embassy bombings, by perverting el-Hage's charitable organization and Mohamed Odeh's fishing business to provide cover and financial support to al-Qaida's local operatives. Without this veil of legitimacy, bin Laden's organization was forced to assume substantially greater risk in order to generate local funds to support the Mombasa operation. Thus, crime was likely a financial tactic of last resort.

[106] Andrew England, "AP Exclusive: FBI's most wanted leader of al-Qaida cell indicted for U.S. embassy bombing escaped," Associated Press, June 10, 2004.

In addition to living expenses for the attack team's members,[107] the monies generated by Fazul's criminal exploits went towards the purchase of weapons from neighboring Somalia's expansive black market. The shoulder-fired rockets that the team used in the attempt on the Arkia Airlines flight traveled a circuitous route to end-up for sale in East Africa. The missiles were part of the weapons surplus left-over from the Cold War and were manufactured in the Soviet Union in 1978, before being sold to Yemen in a larger arms deal in 1994. The paperwork then becomes spotty, and the missiles arrived in Somalia either as the result of commercial arms dealers' smuggling efforts, or as part of a shipment that Yemen sold to the Government of Eritrea, which then consigned the weapons to Somali warlord Hussein Aideed in 1998. If the missiles followed the former route, then the attack team could have purchased them in one of Somalia's numerous arms bazaars, and if the missiles followed the latter route, then they may have been purchased directly from Aideed's clan, or may have been a gift of sorts, made to reward the support that al-Qaida had shown by advising the clan throughout the early and mid-1990s. Regardless of the specifics, the attack team smuggled the missiles across the porous Kenyan border via a maritime route in the summer of 2002, alongside a pair of Bulgarian-made launchers, which were disguised by a hastily-applied coat of blue and white paint.[108]

Detailed information on the source of the explosives used in the bombing of the Paradise Hotel has yet to emerge, but given the team's close association with Somalia and that country's preponderance of arms markets, it is reasonable to assume that the attack team simply purchased them in Mogadishu and smuggled them into Kenya via the same seaborne route as the missiles. Ultimately, none of the resources used in the Mombasa attack would have been particularly difficult for individuals with ample funding and long experience in Somalia to obtain from regional sources.

[107] Omar statement.
[108] Tafrov report.

The final materiel resource used in the attack was the blue Mitsubishi SUV that served as the bomb-vehicle. It was acquired in much the same fashion as the vehicles used in the 1998 bombings. With money he acquired from Abu Talha, Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, who also served as trigger-man in the Moi airport attack, bought the car second-hand for cash from a local seller.[109]

However, in terms of manpower, the 1998 and 2003 attacks differed substantially. While al-Qaida staffed embassy-bombing almost entirely with experienced jihadists recruiting from within the organization, al-Qaida assembled the Mombasa operation largely by recruiting novice jihadists from outside the organization. Personal ties were the primary mechanism used to draw inexperienced accomplices into the conspiracy.

Many of these links ran through blood and marriage. About a year before the 2002 attacks, Fazul moved to Lamu, in Kenya‘s costal district, and began working as an Islamic studies teacher under the alias of Abdul Karim.[110] Aboud Rogo, a preacher that Fazul first met sometime around 1997[111] and the same man who received al-Haramain funding, helped the Comorian terrorist to blend into the community by introducing him to extended family members. Fazul soon married Rogo‘s cousin, Amina Kubwa, and began living with her immediate family. These living arrangements proved conducive to recruiting; Amina‘s brother and father, both named Mohammed Kubwa, played supporting roles in the Mombasa attacks, as did Rogo.

Indeed, the data estimates that eight of the 14 individuals (57 percent) directly involved in Fazul's operational and financial network in 2002 also shared some sort of family connection.

Other members of the team were recruited through friendship and business ties. For example, Issa Osman Issa, an ethnic Somali with previous experience in that country's ethno-religious conflict and who served as the second triggerman in the Moi airport attack, drew Omar Said Omar, the logistical supporter who arranged the attack team's escape boat to Somalia, into jihad while the two worked side-by-side. The pair first met in Kenya, circa 1998, and began a financial partnership the following year, when they established a business wholesaling lobsters in Kismayo, Somalia. At that time, Issa began to discuss jihad, and ultimately convinced his business partner that Muslims had a duty to defend their religion. Following another move in November 2001, this time to Mogadishu, Issa introduced Omar to Fazul and Swedan. Thus, the Mombasa operation did not benefit from the long-term, battled-forged bonds to the same extent as the 1998 bombings, which involved numerous Afghan veterans. Those who provided logistical support to the 2002 attack were primarily locals who were drawn into the attack via Fazul's familial connections and diffuse friendship bonds, rather than pre-existing ties to al-Qaida.

Aside from the operation's leaders, Fazul and Abu Talha, there is one additional member of the team on-the-ground who may have had more durable ties to al-Qaida: Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan.[112] Another Kenyan, Nabhan would gain minor renown in later years as a member of the Somalia-based insurgent group al-Shabaab. While the open-source record is clear regarding his post-Mombasa involvement in terrorism, it is less so regarding his early history.

[112] "Statement Under Inquiry of Omar Said Omar."

Some sources claim that Nabhan played a role in the 1998 embassy attacks,[113] but this seems fairly unlikely, since his name does not appear in the entire 8,700-plus page transcript of the trial of the defendants responsible for this attack. Moreover, since Nabhan was born in 1981,[114] he would have been only about 17 years old at the time of the 1998 attacks, or roughly 15 years younger than the average age of the individuals directly linked to the Nairobi and Dar es Salaam bombings.[115] Young terrorists are by no means unusual—Fahad was only in his early 20s during the 1998 operation—but when taken alongside Nabhan's apparent absence from the trial transcripts, this evidence suggests that any role he might have played in the 1998 bombings was minor, and he more likely made his debut as an operational terrorist in the 2002 attacks, though as the section on training discusses in greater detail, he did benefit from al-Qaida training during the late 1990s.

Ultimately, the differences between the pools of manpower used in the 1998 and 2002 attacks likely represent a devolution of organizational capacity forced on al-Qaida by changes in the organization's circumstance. Following the 1998 bombings and the 9/11 attacks, al-Qaida's profile increased dramatically; it was far more difficult for known members of the organization to transit between countries, particularly after the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in late 2001 eliminated the organization's primary sanctuary. Consequently, al-Qaida may have relied heavily on local novices in Mombasa for the same reasons that the organization turned to crime to finance the 2002 operation: circumstances precluded the organization from establishing the infrastructure necessary to move large numbers of veteran members into the East African theater.

[114] "US troops raid Somali town controlled by fighters," Guardian Unlimited, September 14, 2009.
[115] This statistic was calculated using attribute data that listed individuals' dates of birth. For the two dozen people the data labels as direct operational or financial participants in the 1998 bombings, the year of birth was subtracted from 1998, before a mean value was calculated.

While information on the attack's logistical supporters is fairly clear, few details have emerged regarding the bomb-maker. There is no evidence that the Mombasa team benefited from the input of a specialized technician like Muhsin Musa Matwalli Atwah, who wired the Nairobi and Dar es Salaam bombs. Indeed, it seems likely that Fazul and Abu Talha built the bomb themselves.

Both men were certainly capable of the feat. Fazul had assisted Atwah in the construction of the Nairobi bomb, and Abu Talha was one of the handful of al-Qaida operatives that bin Laden dispatched to Lebanon in the early 1990s to receive explosives training with the Shia terror group Hizballah—a rare instance of cooperation among extremists from different branches of Islam.[116] If this speculative argument proves true, then members of the Mombasa attack team were forced to be more functionally diverse and more self-reliant that their predecessors in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam. Al-Qaida lacked the ability to utilize true technical experts and had to rely on generalists with broader bases of terrorist knowledge.

4.2.3 TRAINING

Given the nature of the manpower that al-Qaida used in the 2002 attack, it is not especially surprising that the bulk of the Mombasa team lacked training in Afghanistan. Beyond Fazul and Abu Talha, the two triggermen who fired on the jetliner departing Moi Airport had demonstrable jihadist experience. The evidence suggests that Issa was a veteran of the Mogadishu conflict,[117] where, given Somali tribesmen's well-documented penchant for firing Stingers at American helicopters,[118] he likely gained some experience with shoulder-fired rockets similar to the one he fired on November 26, 2002.

[117] Omar statement.
[118] Blackhawk Down.

Nabhan, meanwhile, seems to have benefitted from Afghan training, which, it is worth noting, seems to have taken place during the same time period as the East African embassy bombings, and therefore likely precluded his participation in those attacks. Specifically, he spent time in one of al-Qaida's camps in the Khost region in 1998, before briefly fighting alongside the Taliban in its struggle against the Northern Alliance. He may have received some explosives training during this period, and therefore may have had the skills necessary to assist in the construction of the bomb used to target the Paradise Hotel.[119] But regardless of the specifics of his training, it is clear that both he and Issa—the two individuals with the most active role in the airport-attack—were seasoned jihadists with comparable experience to the 1998 attackers.

However, this pattern of experience did not extend to the remainder of the attack-team. Neither of the martyrs who died in the Paradise Hotel bombing nor the team's remaining support-personnel seem to have possessed similar backgrounds. This stands in stark contrast to the 1998 embassy bombings, in which only a single member of the attack-team was a novice jihadist.

In order to mitigate the naïveté that characterized the bulk of the team, Fazul conducted his own mini-camp in Somalia. Working primarily inside the house that the team rented in Mogadishu in the fall of 2001, Fazul and Issa put the team's greener members through some basic paramilitary training and schooled recruits on basic marksmanship, using AK-47 rifles and handguns purchased from local arms markets. The team also had several hand grenades in its possession during its time in Somalia, but it is unclear how much, if any, training the recruits received with this or any other type of explosives.[120]

[119] "Kenyan paper profiles Al-Qa'idah terrorist Saleh Nabhan," BBC Monitoring Africa - Political, June 22, 2009.
[120] Omar statement.

Ultimately, these circumstances reinforce conclusions about the nature of specialization within the Mombasa attack team. While the men responsible for the 1998 embassy bombing were able to rely on the substantial organizational infrastructure that al-Qaida possessed in Afghanistan in the mid-to-late 1990s, the loss of sanctuary bin Laden's organization experienced with the U.S. invasion in the fall of 2001 forced the Mombasa team to be more autonomous, and the quality of training available to the team's greener members was briefer and more haphazard as a result. Realistically, the leaders of the Mombasa operation could neither import pre-trained operatives from South Asia, nor send their local supporters abroad because the Afghan camps had been lost, and the facilities that al-Qaida now maintains in Pakistan were yet to be established. It seems that the team was autonomous in terms of training for want of better options.

4.2.4 SUMMATION

Al-Qaida clearly supported the 2002 Mombasa attacks at an organizational level, and this event mirrored the 1998 embassy bombing in several important ways. Both were coordinated strikes that were planned and implemented over the course of several months. As demonstrated by Aboud Rogo's receipt of al-Haramain funding, it is also exceptionally likely that the 2002 attacks benefitted from one of the same types of organizational funding that supported the 1998 bombings. Similarly, KSM's possible involvement in the attacks' strategic planning and the relationship that existed between Fazul and bin Laden in the fall of 2001 strongly suggest that the highest echelons of al-Qaida's leadership initiated the Mombasa attacks, just as it had in regards to the embassy bombings.

However, this Mombasa attacks also deviated from the model of the 1998 attacks in important ways. While the embassy bombing-teams followed a hierarchical model of organization and were staffed almost entirely by experienced personnel with specialized areas of expertise, the Mombasa team was flatter, less specialized, and less experienced. The leaders of the 2002 operation wore many different hats. As demonstrated by Fazul's involvement in credit card fraud and car-jackings, these leaders independently financed a portion of their operation, without the benefit of the same organizational infrastructure that went into the establishment of Odeh's fishing business in the late 1990s. Moreover, the leaders of the 2002 team served in a training capacity and conducted independent instructional courses instead of shipping recruits to study terrorism in South Asia.

Finally, there is the nature of the team itself. While the men involved in the embassy bombing were by and large seasoned operatives with long associations with al-Qaida, the Mombasa team contained a large number of novice jihadists who were recruited from the local population via friendship bonds and family ties, though on the day of the attack the job that required the most expertise, namely firing the rockets at the Israeli jetliner, fell to experienced men. But the use of green recruits as suicide bombers in the Paradise Hotel attack and the general lack of experience that typified the operatives who provided logistical support to the Mombasa operation demonstrate that the nature of al-Qaida's involvement in terrorism had changed dramatically between 1998 and 2002. The Mombasa attack team blended elements of formal organizational support with aspects of self-organizing network behavior, because a handful of seasoned operatives created, trained, and then supervised their own independent operational cell, rather than importing a full team of seasoned men as al-Qaida had in 1998.

The reasons underlying this structural shift were fairly obvious. Although al-Qaida had successfully conducted large-scale attacks on U.S. Embassies in East Africa in 1998 and on the U.S.S. Cole while the American warship was in port in Yemen in 2000, the threat posed by bin Laden's organization remained misunderstood, even among most specialists, until the events of September 11, 2001, focused the full attention of the public and policy-makers on the threat posed by al-Qaida.[121] Following this shift in perception, bin Laden and his followers became truly notorious and received tremendous attention from the global counterterrorism community. The blended behavior exhibited by the Mombasa attack team represented an attempt to maintain the organization's strategic objectives, namely frightening Westerners into removing their influence from the domain Muslims sought to claim as their own, in a new and fundamentally different operating environment. However, the attack that resulted from these efforts suffered because al-Qaida was simply unable to bring the same sort of resources to bear in the East African theater in 2002 as the organization had been able to muster during the 1990s. Ultimately, al-Qaida's hierarchical structure was a victim of its own success. In 2004, the last year in which the quantitative model found a non-Western event in which al-Qaida played a strong functional role, this pattern again changed, and al-Qaida's involvement in terrorism became both more diffuse and demonstrably less dangerous.

[121] For example, Richard A. Clarke, who served as a counterterrorism official during George W. Bush's first term in office, stated that "most senior officials in the administration did not know the term (al-Qaida) when we briefed them in January 2001" (Against all Enemies, p. 31). Similarly, in his journalistic account of the events preceding the September 11 attacks, Lawrence Wright described how shortly after the millennium, the FBI's hierarchy "continued to view al-Qaeda as a distant and manageable threat" (The Looming Tower, p. 298). Finally, the 9/11 Commission painted a similar, though more nuanced picture, by noting that members of the intelligence community had circulated several specialized reports on bin Laden by the fall of 2001, but noting that the intelligence community failed to provide "an authoritative depiction of his organization's relationships with other governments, or the scale of the threat his orgnaiztaion posed to the United States" and explaining that neither the Clinton nor Bush administrations "fully understood just how many people al Qaeda might kill, and how soon it might do it" (pp. 342-343).

4.3 JUNDALLAH'S 2004 ATTACKS ON PAKISTAN

In 2004, a terrorist group calling itself Jundallah, or soldiers of god, conducted a series of terror strikes in-and-around Karachi, Pakistan.[122] Tactics varied from bombings to armed assaults, and targets included a Bible society, the city's Marina Club, a pair of Shiite religious sites, police targets around the city, and the Pakistan-American Cultural Center.[123] Although Jundallah claimed these attacks in its own name, the quantitative model attributed al-Qaida with a strong role in some of these events, because Jundallah's two leaders, Atta-ur Rahman and Shahzad Bajwa, had received training in one of al-Qaida's Waziristan-based facilities immediately prior to initiating their campaign of terror. Al-Qaida's trend toward diffuse functional involvement in terrorism, which began when al-Qaida blended unseasoned jihadists with experienced operatives during the Mombasa attacks, saw its next evolution in the events involving Jundallah, because instead of relying on an independent cell that operated under the supervision of a handful of experienced al-Qaida members, bin Laden's organization fomented jihad in 2004 by unleashing trainees of questionable competence to conduct attacks without any apparent organizational-level support from al-Qaida.

4.3.1 PLANNING

Jundallah's attacks cannot be studied with the same level of detail as the 1998 embassy bombings of the 2002 Mombasa attacks because comparable information resources, such as detailed court transcripts or co-conspirator confessions, are simply not available. However, the pace and nature of Jundallah's attacks says much about their planning. Rather than large, coordinated strikes that were planned over the course of months, Jundallah initiated a rapid series of smaller, less sophisticated attacks.

[122] This organization should not be confused with the Iranian organization of the same name, which claims to fight for Sunni rights within the Shia state. For introductory information on Iranian Jundallah, see: "Profile: Iran's Jundullah militants," BBC News, June 20, 2010.

Indeed, Jundallah's initial actions were truly amateurish and required little specific planning. The organization's members hurled hand-grenades at a bible society located in Karachi's Sadar neighborhood in January 2004.[124] Two months later, in the Ferozabad area of Karachi, the group shot-up a van filled with members of a government-aligned paramilitary organization, killing two and wounding several others, [125] and in April, the Jundallah again targeted law enforcement, shooting dead five officers inside Karachi's Gulistan-e-Johar police station in an attack that was more reminiscent of gangland drive-bys than the timed, coordinated strikes that characterized al-Qaida's efforts in East Africa in 1998 and 2002.[126]

Later in the spring of 2004, the sophistication of Jundallah's attacks increased moderately, when the group car-bombed the Karachi Marina Club, but this advancement was not especially effective since the attack only killed one and injured nine.[127] However, Jundallah apparently learned from this failure. When the organization revisited the tactic of car-bombings in May, detailed planning was more evident and paid greater dividends for the organization. When Jundallah members simultaneously detonated a pair of explosive-laden vehicles in front of the Pakistan-American Cultural Center in Karachi, they managed to injure 37 people.

Moreover, this attack demonstrated that the group's strategic vision of jihad had evolved alongside its tactics. In accordance with al-Qaida's stated goals, Jundallah now targeted sites overtly linked to the West. Indeed, in 2004, the organization had also planned to storm the U.S.

Consulate in Karachi using light machine guns,[128] but before Jundallah could implement the plot, its evolution was cut short by a botched assassination attempt on the top-ranked general in Karachi, Ahsan Saleem Hayat.

On June 10th, Jundallah reverted back to its previous mode of attack and targeted Hayat's motorcade in a poorly organized armed assault. The general escaped unscathed, but 10 others died in the exchange of fire. Police later found the now-bloodstained van that the terrorists had stolen to make their get-away, and its owner was able to provide good descriptions of the thieves. Within two days of the failed attack, the authorities arrested Rahman, Bajwa, and their immediate accomplices. This action ostensibly eliminated the small organization the Pakistani extremists had founded.[129]

4.3.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

The unsophisticated nature of Jundallah's attacks dictates that they were inexpensive, and the wide availability of weapons in the region dictates that the supplies the attackers required were easy to obtain. Indeed, by the millennium, automatic rifles had become so prevalent in Pakistan that journalists began characterizing the country as a "Kalashnikov culture."[130] Estimates claim that some 2,000 families are involved in the small-scale production of guns in the Darra Adamkhel region of the Federally Administered Tribal Area (FATA) alone, and only a fraction of these manufacturers sell their arms abroad.[131] Consequently, automatic rifles like those used in many of Jundallah's attacks sold for an average price of 280 USD in Pakistan circa 2004,[132] and hand grenades can be purchased throughout South Asia for only a few dollars apiece.[133] Therefore, the logistical chains involved in Jundallah's attacks were far shorter than those supporting the 1998 and 2002 attacks in East Africa, and with the possible exception of the bombing of the Pakistan-American Cultural Center, the finance of Jundallah's attacks required little in the way of organizational support.

4.3.3 TRAINING

Al-Qaida's role in Jundalla's attacks is clearly evident in the training histories of the small Pakistani group's leaders. In November 2003, a few months before Jundallah's 2004 campaign of terror began, Rahman and Bajwa trained in South Waziristan, near the village of Shakai, at a facility al-Qaida had constructed on the land of a tribal leader named Edia Khan.[134] Evidence which emerged following the Rahman and Bajwa's arrest also linked the camp to Masrab Arochi, another of al-Qaida planner Khalid Sheikh Mohammad's many nephews,[135] and although the argument is speculative, it seems likely that Arochi instructed Rahman and Bajwa. Given that no evidence has emerged suggesting that al-Qaida played an active operational or financial role in Jundallah's largely amateurish attacks, it seems that bin Laden's organization provided the small Pakistani organization with minimal training, before sending its members out into the world to wreak unspecified havoc against the perceived enemies of Islam.

4.3.4 SUMMATION

The diffuse role that al-Qaida played in the attacks that Jundallah conducted in 2004 did not spring from nowhere. Instead, the pattern was a continuation of the organizational behavior witnessed in Mombasa in 2002. While al-Qaida blended aspects of hierarchy with flat networks by tasking experienced operatives to build their own independent cell in East Africa in 2002, bin Laden's organization was farther removed from Jundallah's attacks in-and-around Karachi. No evidence has yet emerged suggesting that Jundallah benefitted from financial, logistical, or planning assistance from al-Qaida. Instead, al-Qaida trainers, likely Masrob Arochi, ideologically indoctrinated the Jundallah's leaders and taught them how to conduct jihad without outside assistance. Thus, between the 2002 Mombasa attacks and Jundallah's 2004 attacks in Pakistan, the nature of al-Qaida's involvement in terrorism morphed from a pattern of orchestrating jihad, by actively leading and supervising novice terrorists in the conduct of an operation, to a pattern of fomenting violence, by sending fresh trainees to conduct violence using their own independent resources and means. The danger presented by al-Qaida devolved proportionally, because these green trainees lacked the ability to conduct jihad on the same scale as al-Qaida's seasoned members had in earlier attacks.

4.4 CONCLUSION

These cases suggest that the means al-Qaida used to accomplish its strategic goals in the non-Western world changed dramatically between 1998, when the organization first gained widespread international attention with major attacks in East Africa, and 2004, when the quantitative model last attributed a major role in a non-Western terrorist event to the group. In the most general sense, these changes were transformative in nature. As summarized by table

4.1, bin Laden's organization progressed gradually from the direct conduct of attacks using a largely hierarchical model of structural organization to a diffuse network-based model, in which the organization trained and indoctrinated aspiring jihadists to conduct violence independently, without any demonstrable logistical or financial support from the main body of the organization.

However, it would be misleading to construe this evolution as evidence of successful adaptation, because these cases also demonstrate a steady pattern of declining organizational capacity. In 1998, bin Laden's group was able to support a full team of experienced operatives using quasi-legitimate means, as epitomized by the identification cards issued by el-Hage's charitable organization and the operational expenses partially paid for by Odeh's fishing business, but in 2002, al-Qaida made extensive use of novice jihadists to support the Mombasa attacks, and although the team likely still benefitted from some organizational funding, as demonstrated by Rogo's receipt of al-Haramain donations, Fazul was forced to turn to crime to augment the team's operating budget. By 2004, al-Qaida's involvement had become limited to a training role, and Jundallah's team contained no individuals with demonstrable previous experience in jihad and did not demonstrably benefit from any sort of additional support from al-Qaida at the organizational level. Therefore, it ultimately seems that al-Qaida's ability to conduct terrorist attacks in a non-Western context has devolved significantly since the Global War on Terrorism began circa 2001.

However, it would be premature to dismiss al-Qaida as a legitimate threat. This chapter considers only the organization's involvement in terrorist attacks on civilians and does not discuss al-Qaida's involvement in the related phenomenon of insurgency. It remains possible that the organization's role in non-Western terrorism morphed because of a concurrent change in emphasis that privileged attacks on coalition troops in Iraq and Afghanistan over other forms of violence, but given that as of 2010, CIA director Leon Panetta estimated the total number of al-Qaida members in Afghanistan at no more than 50 or 100,[136] conclusions about the organizations' declining capabilities likely hold irrespective of a shift in al-Qaida's relative prioritization of insurgency and terrorism.

That said, conclusions regarding the organization's declining capacity may still be premature, because this chapter has not considered hit squad attacks conducted in the West. Consequently, the next chapter turns its attention to this subject.

5.0 ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT? ASSESSING THE CHANGING CAPABILITIES OF AL-QAIDA HIT SQUADS DELPOYED TO THE WEST

The hit squads al-Qaida has deployed to the West mirror the organization's non-Western attack-teams in many ways. The evidence suggests that the quality of both classes of attackers has decreased substantially over time. Indeed, circa 2001, when coordinated strikes by al-Qaida hit squads successfully toppled the World Trade Center and damaged the Pentagon, the organization's Western attack-teams were well-organized and well-trained; many operatives held highly specialized skill-sets, and senior al-Qaida leaders oversaw and administered operations with a degree of professionalism and bureaucracy reminiscent of legitimate corporations. However, by the end of 2005, this relatively formal structure had been replaced by one-off instances of cooperation that were almost ad-hoc in nature. Given that this new pattern, which repeated again in 2009, was accompanied by a dramatic decrease in the caliber of al-Qaida's operatives, the extent and quality of their training, and their access to the organization's financial and logistical resources, it is difficult to support the oft-stated claim that al-Qaida is a successfully adaptive organization.[1]

[1] For examples of theorists who extol al-Qaida's adaptive ability, see: Bruce Hoffman, "The Changing Face of Al Qaeda and the Global War on Terrorism," Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, Vol. 27 (2004). Norman Cigar, "Al-Qaida, the Tribes, and the Government: Lessons and Prospects for Iraq's Unstable Triangle," Marine Corps University, Middle East Studies Occasional Papers, Number Two, September 2011.

Although the evidence suggests that the rate of decline differed between al-Qaida's Western and non-Western attack teams, this chapter ultimately argues that the organization's shift toward flatter, less hierarchical structural forms was a failed experiment, not a successful adaptation. As al-Qaida moved toward a more networked structure, the organization's capabilities declined substantially. Today, al-Qaida is far less capable of conducting successful mass-casualty attacks in the West than was the case a decade ago.

This chapter contains six sections following this introduction. The first discusses the most notorious example of an al-Qaida hit squad attack conducted in the West, namely the September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, D.C. The second section begins a three-part discussion of al-Qaida's attempts to attack London and assesses a 2004 plot to destroy several sites around the city using fertilizer-bombs. The third section continues this line of discussion by examining the July 7, 2005, suicide-attacks on the city's mass-transit system—an event related to the previous plot by shared personnel. The fourth section concludes the chapter's discussion of London-based attacks with a discussion of the failed suicide-bombings that took place on July 21, 2005—an event related to the earlier July attack through overlapping training and shared technical planning. In order to demonstrate that the trends evident in the latter 2005 attack extend into the contemporary period, the fifth section assess a failed 2009 plot to suicide-bomb the subway in New York City, before the sixth section offers some brief conclusions that speak to the need to amend the theoretical literature on al-Qaida. In an effort to ensure even cross-comparison, the topical sections of this chapter follow the same internal structure used in the previous chapter and respectively discuss each event's planning, inter-related logistics and finance, and training, before a brief summation compares the case to preceding events.

5.1 THE SEPTEMBER 11, 2001, ATTACKS ON NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON, D.C.

The events of September 11, 2001, are well known and require only the briefest recounting here. At Boston's Logan Airport, five hijackers—Mohammed Atta, Abdul Aziz al-Omari, Satam al-Suqami, Waleed al-Shehri, and Wail al-Shehri—boarded American Airlines flight 11, shortly before it departed for Los Angeles at 7.59am. Fifteen minutes later, another Los Angeles-bound plane, United Airlines Flight 175, also departed from Logan and carried another five hijackers: Marwan al-Shehhi, Fayez Banihammad, Mohand al-Shehri, Hamza al-Ghamdi, and Ahmed al-Ghamdi. Meanwhile, at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, D.C., a third Los Angeles-bound plane, namely American Airlines Flight 77, departed at 8.20am; onboard was a third group of hijackers: Hani Hanjour, Nawaf al-Hazmi, Khalid al-Mihdar, Majed Moqed, and Salem al-Hazmi. Finally, at 8.42am, United Airlines Flight 93 left the Newark airport bound for San Francisco; its passengers included a fourth group of hijackers: Ziad Jarrah, Saeed al-Ghamdi, Ahmed al-Haznawi, and Ahmed al-Nami.[2]

Using box-cutters and utility knives, the hijackers took-over all four flights and murdered the flight crews. Atta, al-Shehhi, Hanjour, and Jarrah placed themselves at the controls. At 8.46am, only four minutes after the Newark flight took-off, Atta piloted American Airlines Flight 11 into the North Tower of the World Trade Center in Manhattan. Seventeen minutes later, al-Shehhi piloted United Airlines Flight 175 into the South Tower of the same building. Then, at 9.37am, Hanjour piloted American Airlines Flight 77 into the Pentagon, and just before 10.00am, the South Tower of the World Trade Center collapsed. Only three minutes later, Jarrah, who was likely bound for the White House, crashed United Airlines Flight 93 into a corn field outside Shanksville, PA, about 85 miles southeast of Pittsburgh, after passengers rose-up to confront the flight's other hijackers. Twenty-five minutes later, at 10.28am, the North Tower collapsed.[3] In addition to the hijackers, a total of 2996 people died in the 9/11 attacks,[4] and thousands more were injured. The coordinated strike remains the deadliest incident of non-state terrorism on record.[5]

Al-Qaida's role in the 9/11 attacks is beyond question. Despite conspiracy theorists' persistent efforts to introduce false debate,[6] official inquiries and rigorous independent investigations have provided overwhelming evidence demonstrating that al-Qaida conducted every phase of the attacks. To state the obvious: bin Laden's supporters acted as an organization to plan, finance, logistically support, and execute the 9/11 attacks. Rather than offering new evidence to support a conclusion that existing narratives have already proven beyond any shadow of a doubt, the paragraphs below offer a summary that serves as a benchmark against which to compare subsequent examples of al-Qaida hit squad attacks on the West. Essentially, it is necessary to understand the extent of organizational capability and formal structure that existed in al-Qaida at the highpoint that was 9/11 in order to scale the organizational devolution that occurred in subsequent years.

5.1.1 PLANNING

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who claims to have managed "the 9/11 operation, from A to Z,"[7] first considered using jetliners as improvised cruise missiles circa 1995, while working with his nephew, Ramzi Yousef, on the Bojinka Plot,[8] an ambitious plan to simultaneously bomb a dozen American-flagged trans-Pacific flights using liquid-based explosives triggered by timed detonators. When Philippine authorities interrupted Bojinka by arresting a pair of co-conspirators who managed to start their Manila apartment on fire while mixing incendiary chemicals,[9] KSM began to believe that explosives were an unreliable means of attack, especially given that his nephew's explosives-based operation against the World Trade Center in 1993 had failed to bring-down the twin towers. KSM thought that perhaps planes could better serve as weapons in their own right, not just targets.[10]

He then envisioned an attack that would use commercial airliners as improvised cruise missiles, but the initial draft of this "planes operation" differed substantially from the attack that actually transpired in 2001. KSM's original plan called for the hijacking of 10 jetliners, nine of which suicide-pilots would crash into targets on both of the United States' coasts, including CIA's headquarters in suburban Virginia, the FBI's headquarters in Northwest Washington, D.C., a handful of nuclear plants around the country, and skyscrapers in both California and Washington state, as well as the sites struck on 9/11. KSM, who planned to be onboard the final plane, would then land and kill all of the adult men onboard, before delivering a speech to the global media condemning American policies in the Muslim world.[11] When KSM presented this idea to bin Laden and other high-ranking al-Qaida leaders in the 1996, their response was tepid; they believed the operation was overly complex and unrealistic.[12]

Then, in 1998, shortly after bin Laden demonstrated the depth of his commitment to battle the United States by ordering attack-teams to bomb American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, the dissident Saudi began to reappraise KSM's ambitious plan. After speaking with Muhammad Atef, bin Laden scheduled a meeting with KSM in Kandahar, Afghanistan, and offered the planner the opportunity to join al-Qaida. Although KSM declined in an effort to preserve his independence—he did not formally swear bayat to bin Laden until after the 9/11 attacks—he did agree to move his family to Kandahar, so that he could begin working with al-Qaida to advance attacks against the United States.[13]

A watershed event in the planning of 9/11 occurred in the spring of the following year, when Atef and bin Laden formally decided to proceed with a scaled-down version of the planes operation. KSM then began working closely with the pair to refine the target list. According to KSM's version of events, the three of them were entirely responsible for these high-level planning decisions. The operation then remained a closely guarded secret; no other al-Qaida members were yet permitted a role.[14]

Later in 1999, KSM had to make a substantial adjustment to his plan, because two of the men bin Laden had hand-picked for the operation were unable to obtain visas to the United States. Consequently, KSM decided to split the operation and use the men who could not enter the country to conduct simultaneous hijackings in East Asia. Although it relied on suicide-operatives instead of timed-detonators, this revision was strongly reminiscent of the Bojinka Plot. KSM planned for these hijackers to bomb the planes in mid-flight as they travelled across the Pacific, timing the explosions to coincide with crashes on the American east coast, in order ~~–to~~ maximize the psychological impact of the attack."[15]

However, in April or May of 2000, bin Laden vetoed the operation's East Asian portion. His decision, which emphasized the hierarchical nature of authority with al-Qaida prior to 9/11, mirrored his earlier concerns regarding KSM's initial 10-plane vision of the attack: a joint-strike on the United States and East Asia was simply too complicated. No reasonable means existed to coordinate the actions of attack-teams separated by 10 time zones.[16] With this decision, bin Laden effectively determined that the final scope of the operation would be limited to America's eastern seaboard.

As the planning of the operation moved from the strategic level to the tactical level, al-Qaida continued to be involved, and interactions continued to flow through a relatively hierarchical command structure. For example, in contrast to the flat organizational structures used in later attacks, some vital planning tasks were assigned to specialists who were not part of the final attack-team. Specifically, KSM tasked two men with aspects of reconnaissance: Dihren Barot, an Indian-born British citizen who adopted the nicknamed Abu Musa al-Hindi when he converted to Islam from Hinduism; and Walid bin Attash, a Yemeni who played a planning role in the U.S.S. Cole bombing and who was considered as a possible hijacker in the planes operation until visa problems removed him from consideration very early in the attack's planning. In August 2000, Barot reconnoitered targets in Washington, D.C., and in March of the following year, he took a helicopter trip across Manhattan, conducted ground-level surveillance on several New York landmarks, and even shot video footage of the World Trade Center.[17] Attash, meanwhile, took a pair of flights on American-flagged jetliners in 1999 and 2000, so that he could report on airline security procedures.[18]

Finally, the hijackers became involved in planning the operational details of the attack in the final months preceding its execution. For example, Atta, al-Shehhi, and Jarrah, who piloted three of the hijacked planes on 9/11, took cross-country reconnaissance flights in the spring of 2001. They traveled in first class, presumably to have the best possible view of cockpit operations and security procedures. Then, in the early summer, Jarrah and Hanjour paid to take specialized low-altitude instructional flights through the Hudson River corridor with pilot-trainers, so that the future hijackers would be as familiar with their routes to the World Trade Center as was possible.[19] Finally, in mid-August, Atta, Hanjour, and the muscle-hijacker al-Hazmi conducted a final round of trans-continental surveillance flights aboard Boeing 757s, the same model of plane the attack-teams targeted on September 11.[20]

Indeed, as the attacks approached the hijackers took responsibility for arguably the most important planning detail of the attack: the date of the strike. According to KSM, bin Laden twice pressured the attack-team to conduct the operation before the hijackers were fully prepared. Initially, bin Laden wanted the attacks conducted on May 12, 2001, exactly seven months after another squad of al-Qaida suicide-bombers attacked the U.S.S. Cole in Yemen.

Then, in June or July, bin Laden heard that Ariel Sharon would be visiting the White House and urged the team to strike during the visit in the hopes of taking-out both the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Israel. However, on both occasions, KSM was able to persuade al-Qaida's emir that the hijackers were not yet ready, and ultimately delegated the authority to determine the exact timing of the attack to the hit squad's coordinator on-the-ground, Mohammed Atta.[21]

In mid-August, Atta set the date of the attack by contacting Ramzi Binalshib, his former roommate in Hamburg and the man that KSM appointed to serve as the communications intermediary between the hijackers in America and al-Qaida's leadership in South Asia. Because the hijackers planned to strike the Capitol building if any of their other targets in the Washington, D.C.-area proved too difficult to strike, Atta set the date to September 11 in order to make certain that Congress was back in session after its summer recess, so as to be able to inflict maximal damage.[22] Thus, even though the final timing of the attack was determined by the men on the ground, all information and planning decisions flowed through a clear chain of command.

5.1.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Issues of money and materiel were just as tightly controlled by al-Qaida's leadership as the attack's planning. Indeed, bin Laden at times micro-managed decisions pertaining to the most important resource necessary to conduct the attack: manpower. He forced KSM to include personal favorites on the attack team, even when they were less than ideally suited to missions in the West. For example, shortly after giving the planes operation the go-ahead in 1999, bin Laden instructed KSM that al-Hazmi and al-Mihdhar, two Saudis who had been involved with al-Qaida since at least the mid-1990s, should be sent to the United States for pilot training,[23] even though neither of the pair spoke English. They would spend some time studying English in San Diego in January 2000, but the men simply had no aptitude for language, which prevented them from learning to fly and ultimately relegated the pair to _musde' roles in the planes operation.[24] Moreover, this micro-management of manpower was far from unusual; Walid bin Attash went so far as to suggest that bin Laden personally approved every member of the 2001 attack-team.[25]

While KSM was largely forced to accept the personnel he was given, he delegated final decisions regarding the implementation of manpower to Atta, who consulted with Binalshibh over the matter in early August, using coded language during a phone call, before determining the exact composition of the attack-teams. Atta then traveled to New Jersey and met with al-Hazmi, the bin Laden favorite who seems to have been granted a special role in the attack based more on his personal relationship with al-Qaida's emir than his qualifications, and then sent two of the muscle hijackers who had been under al-Hazmi's supervision to Miami to link-up with the other men who ultimately comprised their respective attack-teams.[26]

Beyond manpower decisions, other logistical issues were handled using al-Qaida's broad organizational capabilities. For example, by the late 1990s, the organization had established impressive document forgery capabilities. Rather than fashioning new documents from whole cloth, al-Qaida's forgers typically altered legitimate documents. Sometimes, this forgery involved switching pictures, so that individuals could travel under false names,[27] as Ramzi

Binalshibh did when he flew to Malaysia at KSM's direction in June 2001 to meet with members of the hijacking team.[28]

However, because the majority of al-Qaida's members were unknown to the international security community prior to 9/11, document forgery more often involved the addition and deletion of visas and immigration stamps in order to create false trails that obscured passport holders' travels to Afghanistan and other _red flag' locations.[29] Although the 9/11 hijackers traveled on their own, legitimate Saudi and Egyptian passports, the evidence suggests that forgers doctored many of these documents to contain false travel histories.[30] Thus, al-Qaida's organizational capabilities facilitated 9/11 not only by providing one of the attacks' key supporters with a false identity used in furtherance of the attacks, but also by increasing the pedigree of the travel documents the hijackers used to enter the United States.

Finally, the American-based attack-teams handled the remaining resource acquisitions necessary to complete the operation using standard consumer purchases. For example, in mid-August, the attackers bought the box-cutters and utility knives used in the hijacking from retail outlets, and later that month, Jarrah tried to buy aeronautical GPS units from a specialty shop catering to pilots. He wanted four units, no doubt to help guide each of the novice pilots to their intended targets, but for reasons that remain unclear, he was able to secure only one device, and was forced to purchase less-sophisticated aeronautical charts for the remaining pilots. The final logistical resources necessary to complete the attacks, namely the airline tickets for the targeted flights, were purchased by Atta and al-Hazmi between August 25 and September 5.[31]

[29] Ibid, p. 169.
[30] Ibid, p. 235.
[31] Ibid, p. 248-249.

Because the hijackers were entirely dependent on al-Qaida for funding, the organization played a crucial role every purchase made in furtherance of the 9/11 attacks. Money flowed to the attack-team through three channels. Prior to their arrival in the United States, the hijackers received some direct funding from al-Qaida. For example, in late 1999 or 2000, when Atta and the other Hamburg-based members of the attack team traveled back to Germany from Afghanistan, they each received approximately $5,000 to pay their travel expenses. Similarly, when the muscle hijackers traveled to Saudi Arabia to obtain travel documents in preparation for their entry into the United States, they each received about $2,000 in travel expenses, followed by another $10,000 payment, made through a combination of cash and traveler's checks, immediately before their departure for America.[32]

Although KSM provided some of these funds to the muscle hijackers before they left Pakistan, two Dubai-based paymasters made additional disbursements. The first was Ali al-Azia Ali (a.k.a. Ammar al-Baluchi), a nephew of KSM's who was also brother-in-law to Ramzi Yousef. Although he worked a profitable day-job for a computer wholesaler in Dubai's free trade zone, Ali had led a double-life since sometime in 1997, when he first volunteered his services to his uncle. His role in terrorism took-on larger dimensions circa 2000, when KSM sent him well-over $100,000 in cash via courier. These funds, which Ali reportedly kept stashed in a laundry bag in his home, were likely the source of some of the direct payments made to the hijackers.[33]

[33] Ibid, p. 134; High Value Detainee Biographies.

Ali's assistant in Dubai was Mustafa al-Hawsawi, a Saudi who had previously worked with KSM to generate jihadist propaganda.[34] It is not entirely clear why al-Hawsawi became involved in the 9/11 operation. The only explanation that has surfaced is somewhat surprising: Ali was apparently concerned that al-Qaida's demands on his time would negatively impact his performance at his computer job and asked his uncle to send some help. Sometime in the spring of 2001, KSM dispatched Hawsawi, apparently to fulfill his nephew's request. After May, Ali's role as logistical facilitator became secondary to his assistant's, and al-Hawsawi provided about $8,000 to the late-departing hijackers before they left the UAE for the United States.[35]

Similarly, al-Hawsawi made additional disbursements directly to the members of the attack-team when they travelled internationally in the run-up to the attack. For example, in June 2001, when Khalid al-Mihdhar traveled to Saudi Arabia via Dubai, al-Hawsawi provided the hijacker with nearly $5,000 in cash. Al-Mihdhar then used the funds to purchase travelers' checks in Saudi Arabia, before returning to the U.S. in early July.[36]

Beyond these in-person cash payments, the 9/11 attackers also received significant funds via wire transfer. Ali took the lead in these payments. Between April and September of 2000, Ali made six transfers totaling approximately $120,000 to the hijackers. The source of his funds was again the laundry bag of cash that KSM had provided earlier that year. Although al-Qaida had a documented history of transferring funds via hawala, an informal system of money transfer native to South Asia, all of Ali's transactions flowed through the legitimate banking system. Even when Ali transferred $70,000 in a single payment, the transactions were apparently lost in the huge sea of transfers made by Dubai's busy commercial interests. None the wire transfers raised any suspicion among members of the banking community in either Dubai or the United States.[37]

[34] High Value Detainee Biographies.
[35] Roth, et al, p. 136.
[36] Ibid.

Binalshibh also made additional wire transfers to the hijackers in America. In total, he sent approximately $10,400 divided irregularly across four payments made between June and September of 2000. Like Ali, Binalshibh made all of these transfers via the legitimate banking system, though the sources of funds differed. Rather than Ali's bag of cash, Binalshibh obtained the monies from a bank account that he shared with al-Shehhi in Germany's Dresdner Bank.

It seems likely that the account had been filled via legitimate means. Until December 2000, al-Shehhi received a stipend from the UAE military to fund the education that he had abandoned in Germany.[38] Thus, it seems that, in small part, the 9/11 hijackers obtained funding by perverting legitimate sources of income.

Binalshibh also made two transfers totaling $10,000 to Zacarias Moussaoui, using funds that he obtained from al-Hawsawi, who presumably drew the money from Ali's bag of cash before wiring the funds from the UAE to Germany.[39] However, the extent to which these funds constituted an expenditure in furtherance of the 9/11 attacks is open to debate. KSM has insisted that he never intended for Moussaoui to take part in the September attacks; instead, Moussaoui was slated to pilot an aircraft during a second wave of attacks against America's West Coast scheduled for sometime in 2002. In an effort to circumvent airline security, KSM planned to use operatives that either held Western passports (Moussaoui was a French citizen) or that did not have a Middle Eastern appearance (KSM worked with Jemaah Islamiyah to select several East Asian hijackers from the organization's ranks). However, the attack was scrapped as infeasible when airports implemented stricter security protocols in the aftermath of 9/11.[40] Though the difference may be excessively fussy, it seems that Binalshibh's transfers to Moussaoui supported this aborted "second wave" rather than the 9/11 attacks.

[37] Ibid, p. 135.
[38] 9/11 Commission Report, p. 162.
[39] Roth, et al, p. 136.

Beyond wire transfers, the hijackers received a smaller amount of money via deposits made into overseas bank accounts. Specifically, Hanjour received about $10,000 via two accounts he held with bank branches in the Middle East: one at the Saudi-British Bank in Saudi Arabia, and the other at Citibank in the UAE. Ali provided start-up funds for these accounts and replenished them on at least one occasion, after Hanjour drew them down by withdrawing funds via US-based ATMs.[41]

Similarly, Banihammad, one of the muscle hijackers onboard the flight that crashed into the south tower of the World Trade Center, opened a pair of accounts at the UAE's Standard Charter Bank. He deposited the equivalent of about $30,000 in local currency. Since Banihammadi had the money with him when he entered the UAE in June 2001, the funds presumably came directly from KSM. Al-Hawsawi was a co-signer on the accounts and bolstered Banihammadi's funds on at least one occasion, depositing nearly $5,000 into the accounts in August 2001. Like Hanjour, Banihammadi accessed these accounts via ATM, but he also had a Visa check-card linked directly to them; it was used to purchase two of the hijackers' plane tickets, as well as to pay a portion of the hotel expenses the hijackers incurred in the days immediately preceding the attacks.[42]

With the partial exception of Nawaf al-Hazmi, who spent about a month working as a gas station attendant for a wage of six dollars per hour, none of the 9/11 hijackers worked during their time in the United States, in either the licit or illicit economies. Similarly, except for the student stipend that al-Shehhi drew from the UAE, none of the attackers received any monies from foreign governments. Finally, there is no evidence to support the oft-cited assertion[43] that a Madrid-based al-Qaida cell led by radical cleric Imad Barakat Yarkas (a.k.a. Abu Dahdah) provided any funding to the 9/11 hijackers.[44] Thus, it seems that the entire cost of the 9/11 attacks, which official inquiries estimate at between $400,000 and $500,000, was borne by the core of bin Laden's organization.[45]

Although investigators know a fair amount about al-Qaida's means of financial support circa 2001, they have been unable to identify any revenue streams that specifically funded the 9/11 attacks. Briefly, the organization's budget in the years immediately preceding 9/11 was approximately $30 million annually,[46] and these monies came almost entirely from the corruption of charitable donations. In some cases, most notably al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, entire charities were complicit in terrorist finance from the top down. In other instances, corrupt officers of charities acted at the local level to divert funds to al-Qaida. Similarly, imams of some radical mosques in the Middle East (and perhaps also elsewhere) diverted funds that congregants donated as zakat, a type of religious tithing obligatory for all devout Muslims. Because Islamic charitable contributions increase dramatically during the holy month of Ramadan, al-Qaida's funding was somewhat cyclical. This annual pattern required the organization to budget to a certain extent, but there is no evidence that it maintained large stores of surplus cash. Instead, al-Qaida's finances were largely hand-to-mouth, and money went out the door soon after coming-in.[47]

This reality stands in stark contrast to the enduring public conception that bin Laden, and by extension al-Qaida, held millions of dollars in savings. Although bin Laden's family remains among the wealthiest in the world,[48] the dissident Saudi lost his personal fortune years before the 9/11 attacks. The Saudi Government had forced his family to cut him off in 1994, and his remaining funds were lost two years later, when Hasan al-Turabi's government expropriated bin Laden's business interests in the Sudan after expelling al-Qaida from the country.[49] Similarly, despite persistent rumors of al-Qaida involvement in illicit enterprises, including narcotics trafficking and diamond smuggling,[50] official inquiries, which reviewed ~~s~~some of the most sensitive information held by the U.S. government," ultimately concluded that ~~s~~such theories cannot be substantiated."[51] Therefore, a fairly clear line, albeit a broken one, led from the systemic corruption of Islamic charities to the deaths caused by the 9/11 hijackers.

5.1.3 TRAINING

As with planning, logistics, and finance, al-Qaida, as an organization, was responsible for training the men responsible for the 9/11 attacks. Although several of the muscle hijackers had previous experience in jihad, they received additional specialized training in preparation for the 9/11 attacks. This stint of instruction began in the fall of 1999, when several men hand-picked by bin Laden attended what the 9/11 commission called, ~~a~~an elite training course at al Qaeda's Mes Aynak camp in Afghanistan,"[52] but according to KSM this training was more of a slightly more rigorous version of the organization's standard boot camp, not a special training session for 9/11. Many Mes Aynak graduates would go-on to participate in prominent al-Qaida operations other than 9/11, including the U.S.S. Cole attack.[53]

For a handful of select graduates of the camp, more specialized training followed in Karachi, Pakistan, where KSM personally instructed trainees in preparation for the planes operation. During a two-week course, he taught the trainees much of what they would need to know to survive in the West. Topics included: rudimentary English, how to book travel reservations, and how to rent accommodations. Most tellingly, the training also included instruction about how to conduct surveillance onboard flights, and KSM used video game-based flight simulators to try to familiarize the trainees with the layout and function of different types of commercial planes.[54] However, visa problems precluded some of the graduates of these specialized training sessions from actually participating in the attacks. The final attack-team was not set until mid-to-late 2000, at which point the muscle hijackers received even more specialized training.

After acquiring the necessary travel documents, the men who would actively conduct the 9/11 attacks received instruction from Abu Turab al-Jordani, the son-in-law of Ayman al-Zawahiri and one of the few men who knew the full details of the planned attack.[55] Abu Turab's course emphasized specific techniques in close-quarters combat; he taught various means to neutralize armed opponents, in case the hijackers encountered any air marshals, and he instructed the men in weight-training, presumably so they would be strong enough to overpower most airline passengers. KSM claims that Abu Turab went so far as to make the trainees butcher camels and sheep to increase the men's comfort and familiarity with knives.[56]

Now in possession of the semi-specialized skills necessary to take-over an airplane, the muscle hijackers progressed to their last stop before the United States: Dubai. In addition to his logistical and financial role, Ali gave the men one final shot of training on Western life before sending them onward. He guided them through the process of buying airline tickets. He taught them how to use traveler's checks, how to order at fast-food outlets, and how to wear Western-style clothing.[57] With these final interactions, the muscle hijackers were effectively trained—a process that involved al-Qaida at every turn.

Given the highly specialized knowledge required to pilot a plane, it is little surprise that the four men who assumed the controls on 9/11 followed a different training trajectory than the muscle hijackers. Three of the pilots, Atta, al-Shehhi, and Jarrah, arrived in Pakistan in November 1999, from Hamburg, Germany, alongside Binalshibh. The foursome's original intent had been to fight as mujahideen in Chechnya, but an al-Qaida facilitator in Germany convinced the men that heightened border controls had made it too difficult to cross into Russian territory and directed the men to South Asia instead. After undergoing a standard vetting procedure, which included a questionnaire regarding the recruit's language skills and willingness to serve as a martyr, the men caught the eye of Muhammad Atef. They stood-out because of their familiarity with the West and fluency in English.[58] The men were soon introduced to bin Laden, who extended them an offer to serve as suicide-operatives, and after formally pledging their loyalty to al-Qaida, they were sent to Karachi to meet KSM. Shortly thereafter, they began to make preparations for pilot training.[59]

The most important step was obtaining travel documents. Atta, al-Shehhi, and Jarrah entered the U.S. on tourist visas in late June and early July of 2000, and quickly settled into flight-training programs. Specifically, Atta and al-Shehhi studied at Huffman Aviation in Venice, Florida, while Jarrah studied at the Florida Flight Training Center (FFTC), another Venice-based instructional program. Binalshibh had intended to join him at the FFTC, but proved unable to obtain the necessary entrance visas, despite repeated attempts. Thus, given his close ties to the other three pilots, he settled into a logistical role almost by default and thereafter served as a go-between that facilitated contact between al-Qaida's leadership in South Asian and the American-based pilots.[60]

Meanwhile, Atta, al-Shehhi, and Jarrah continued their training, and by mid-August, all three had passed basic flight exams. As they began to take the more advanced courses necessary to pilot multi-engine aircraft, Atta and al-Shehhi petitioned the State Department to convert their tourist visas to student visas and transferred to Jones Aviation, a school located about 20 miles north of Venince, in Sarasota, Florida. However, the men performed poorly at Jones; instructors remember them as exceptionally rude and overly aggressive. After failing a more advanced set of pilot examinations, they returned to Huffman for additional training. In the interim, Jarrah had traveled back to Germany to visit his girlfriend—one of several such trips he made during run-up to the attack—but soon returned to Florida and continued his training. By the end of November, Jarrah obtained his commercial pilot's license; Atta and al-Shehhi would follow suit

a month later, and as 2000 drew to a close, all three men began training to fly large commercial jets at various flight simulation centers in Florida.[61]

Although al-Qaida did not provide this training directly, the organization's hand in the process was evident in Atta, al-Shehhi, and Jarrah's financial histories. The three used monies wired from Ali to pay for both these initial training sessions, as well as for a handful of subsequent training flights. For example, in addition to the instructor-assisted flights that the men made through the Hudson Valley Corridor in the summer of 2001, Atta and al-Shehhi also rented a single-engine plane in Decatur, Georgia, where they flew with a private instructor in January 2001.[62] Given the clear financial links between Ali and KSM, there is no question that al-Qaida financed every aspect of these three men's pilot training.

The fourth pilot, Hanjour, was a serendipitous find for al-Qaida. He followed a circuitous path to become a suicide-pilot. After briefly working for an Afghan _relief' agency as a teenager during the last days of the Soviet-Afghan War, Hanjour applied to a Saudi flight school, but was rejected. In 1996, he briefly studied at flight schools in Florida, California, and Arizona, only to return home unaccredited. He made a more serious attempt the following year, and obtained his commercial license in April 1999. However, he was apparently unable to find work, and after lying to his family about a new job with an Emirati airline, he returned to Afghanistan in the fall of 2000,[63] only to be discovered when Atef reviewed a pile of the standard screening questionnaires al-Qaida used to evaluate potential recruits.[64] Thus, circumstance provided a replacement for Binalshibh shortly after he failed to obtain the entrance visa necessary to train as a pilot in the United States, and with the exception of Hanjour, al-Qaida was either directly or financially responsible for providing all of the direct participants in the 9/11 attacks with the skill sets necessary to conduct the hijackings.

5.1.4 SUMMATION

Although it is important to avoid hyperbole so that al-Qaida's members do not appear to have functioned with the ruthless efficiency of Professor Moriarty or a James Bond villain, it is clear that bin Laden's organization was both highly capable and well-organized circa 2001. As demonstrated by Ali and Hawsawi's roles as financiers, Barot and Attash's roles as conductors of surveillance, and the respective roles of the pilots and muscle hijackers on the day of the attack, operatives held specialized functions. They often received focused training in order to fulfill these roles, and a higher-level manager orchestrated and administrated over these specialists' actions. In the 9/11 attacks, KSM filled this position with significant assistance from Binalshibh, who served as his go-between with the attack-team in the United States. As best demonstrated by bin Laden's ability to impose his personnel decisions on KSM, top-level leaders held ultimate authority over the operation and closely managed several details of the operation. Although the field operatives held increasing autonomy as the operation neared execution—this fact is best demonstrated by the fact that Atta, not bin Laden, set the final date of the attack—authority within al-Qaida was carefully and clearly delegated. Moreover, as Atta's communications with Binalshibh demonstrate, communications continued to flow up a fairly clear chain-of-command throughout the operation.

None of these conclusions should suggest that al-Qaida operated absent dysfunction. Indeed, bin Laden decreased the efficacy of the attack-team by insisting that it include several individuals who lacked the language skills necessary to excel in an American-based operation. But on the whole, the organization operated as a reasonably efficient, fairly hierarchical bureaucracy at the time of the 9/11 attacks. However, by 2004, when the organization began to deploy hit squads to attack London, this pattern would begin to devolve.

5.2 THE 2004 FERTILIZER BOMB PLOT AGAINST LONDON

In March 2004, British police made several arrests in London. The suspects, all men of Pakistani origin, were accused of plotting to attack sites around London using fertilizer bombs.[65] It soon became evident that the scope of their plot was international. Other arrests related to the plot were made in New York[66] and Canada.[67] Because the suspect detained in American soon began cooperating with the authorities, the full extent of al-Qaida's involvement in the plot rapidly became clear.[68]

While bin Laden's organization had conceptualized, staffed, and supported the 9/11 attacks in full, al-Qaida played a more limited, though still strong, role in the 2004 plot. In terms of specifics, al-Qaida lacked a substantial role the plot's staffing, because the attack-team came to al-Qaida ready-made, when a group of like-minded British extremists showed-up en masse at a South Asian training camp. Similarly, the idea for the attack seems to have originated with the plotters, who also orchestrated the attack's planning at the tactical level. However, bin Laden's organization provided the 2004 plotters with the skills and materiel necessary to conduct the bombing, by training the attack-team at a Waziristan-based camp and by acquiring key supplies on the attack-team's behalf. Consequently, this case begins to suggest that al-Qaida's pattern of involvement in hit squad attacks on the West largely mirrored the diffusion and lack of direct control evident in non-Western attacks from 2002 forward.

However, the parallels between al-Qaida's Western and non-Western attacks are limited. Although the 2004 team ultimately failed to complete its operation, it would be incorrect to assert that the quality of al-Qaida's Western hit squads had depreciated between 2001 and 2004 to the same degree seen in the organization's operations in 1998 and 2002 in East Africa, because the 2004 plotters had all of the technical skills necessary to pull-off the attack. Therefore, this case suggests that the effects of the Global War on Terrorism were slower to take effect on al-Qaida's Western hit squads than on the organization's non-Western operations.

5.2.1 PLANNING

It is difficult to determine precisely when the fertilizer plot against London was first conceptualized, because long before mission-based planning began, Omar Khyam, the plot's central leader, had several formative interactions with jihadists and spent years assembling a social-circle comprised of like-minded extremists. This long path to jihad began in the early 1990s, when Khyam was about 11 year-old, and his father walked-out on the family. Although Khyam's household had previously been only nominally Muslim, the pressures of serving as ―the man of the house" led Khyam toward puritanical interpretations of morality. For example, he soon forbade his brother, Shujah Mahmood, who was five years Khyam's junior, from attending the local swimming pool for fear that he would see women clad only in bikinis.[69]

[69] ―Profile: Omar Khyam," BBC News, April 30, 2007; available online: http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/6149794.stm.

By 1998, when Khyam was 17, his religious devotion was overt. He prayed five times daily and began attending meetings of al-Muhajiroun, an organization that sought to establish an Islamic caliphate[70] and which has since been banned in Britain for advocating violence.[71] During these initial forays into fundamentalism, Khyam first met Waheed Mahmood, a 26 year-old British citizen of Pakistani descent who shared his affinity for al-Muhajiroun, and who would join Khyam's attack-team years later.[72]

Similarly, in 2000, a chance meeting during a religious lecture held at the Luton Mosque, about 25 miles north of London, caused Khyam to meet another of his future co-conspirators, namely Salahuddin Amin. Then about 25 years old, Amin was a somewhat unlikely jihadist. He had been born in London, but raised in Pakistan, before returning to the country of his birth at age 16 for post-secondary education, at which point he picked-up many of the local culture's _bad' habits. He drank alcohol, dated women, and played both cricket and soccer throughout his college years. Amin started to lean toward fundamentalism only in 1999, after becoming angry about the treatment of Muslims in Indian-dominated Kashmir.[73] Ultimately, it is clear that Amin, Khyam, and Mahmood shared a radical viewpoint by the turn of the millennium, but it is not clear that they had already begun to conceptualize a strike against London.

Khyam's personal history suggests that other, more recent additions to his circle of friends were made with the idea of waging a terrorist attack specifically in mind. In the summer of 2000, Khyam told his family that he was taking a school-related trip to France and then secretly journeyed to Pakistan instead. He spent three months receiving training from Kashmiri militants before returning home.[74] A similar trip followed the next year, when Khyam headed-off to Afghanistan and spent a brief time with the Taliban.[75] He began to collect aspiring jihadist shortly after returning from this second trip.

Specifically, at another radical lecture held in 2002, Khyam encountered Anthony Garcia, a 22 year-old who had been born Rahman Benouis in Algeria. His family immigrated to Britain when Garcia was a child, and he changed his name in his teens in the hopes of advancing his male-modeling career. Like Amin, Garcia eschewed religion during his teenage years, preferring to spend his time drinking and club-hopping with his predominantly white friends, until he followed his older brother into Islam in 1998 or 1999.[76]

Also in 2002, one of Khyam's housemates introduced him to Mohammad Momin Khawaja,[77] a Canadian computer engineer of Pakistani origin who later used his mastery of electronics to build explosive-detonators for the British team.[78] The final addition to Khyam's circle of associates came the following year, when Khyam met Jawad Akbar, a Pakistani native who had lived in Italy at a child before moving to Britain with his family at age 8. Now about 20, Akbar studied mathematics and technical design at West London's Brunel University, while attending Islamist political groups in his spare time.[79] Thus, Khyam had assembled a collection of like-minded fundamentalists before ever formally associating with al-Qaida, and given their ideological persuasion, it seems likely that this social-circle at least toying explored the idea of martyrdom during ‗casual' conversations about politics and religion.

Their interest in the subject became explicit in the early spring of 2003. By that time, the plotters had moved to Pakistan, and they re-assembled at the house where Waheed Mahmood had begun living in Gujar Khan, just outside of Indian-controlled Kashmir. The host suggested that they could contribute to jihad by bombing London, and after agreeing to the idea, he and his friends decided to advance the nascent plan by undertaking terror-training.[80] Thus, the plotters' decision to attack London seems to have caused them to fall into direct contact with al-Qaida, rather than the other way around, and Khyam's social circle shaped seems to have shaped its training to the mission, without the same type of active guidance that KSM and other senior members of bin Laden's organization provided to the 9/11 hijackers.

Moreover, the evidence suggests that the British team was entirely responsible for selecting the specific targets of the attack, because audio surveillance tapes made by British police in February 2004 recorded the plotters as they debated where to strike. Khyam favored bombing infrastructure targets in order to mitigate Londoners' access to critical supplies,[81] and given that Mahmood once worked for a contractor that maintained Britain's national gas and electric grids,[82] it seems likely that the team had the insider knowledge necessary to mount a legitimate strike on the country's utilities. Meanwhile, Akbar favored bombing ‗immoral' targets like dance clubs, because it would be easy to gain access by taking a low-level job at a club, and because, in his words, —thoseslags dancing around" deserved to die for their indecency.[83]

It remains unclear if the team ever reached a firm targeting decision before arrests broke-up the plot, but since these debates took place after the team came back from South Asia, they clearly lacked specific tactical instructions from al-Qaida's leadership. In short, the 2004 plot was conceived before the plotters trained with bin Laden's organization, and the details were planned at home, after the plotters returned from Pakistan. It seems probably that bin Laden's organization shaped aspects of the attack during the plotters' training, but this role was qualitatively different and far less pronounced than al-Qaida's tight control over the planning of the 9/11 attacks.

5.2.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

However, conclusions regarding the plotters' independent planning should not suggest that bin Laden's organization lacked an important role in the plot; the logistical support that Khyam's team received from al-Qaida demonstrates that London had become a priority target for the organization by 2003. This support began with Nashwan _Abd al-Razzaq _Abd al-Baqi (a.k.a. Abd al-Hadi al-Iraqi),[84] a former major in the Iraqi army whose ties to al-Qaida extended to the organization's highest levels: prior to 9/11, he had served on al-Qaida's military committee, and he was so well-regarded within the organization that he was once personally tasked with Ayman al-Zawahiri's care and safe-keeping.[85] Al-Baqi's specific role in Khyam's plot was to direct Mohammed Junaid Babar, a Pakistani-born American citizen who procured materiel for al-Qaida in South Asia, to obtain ammonium nitrate fertilizer and aluminum powder, two common ingredients in improvised explosive devices, in preparation for the London attack.[86] Although Babar was unable to locate the fertilizer, he obtained the aluminum powder without incident,[87] and British police later found it in the possession of Khyam, who apparently brought the material back to Britain in his luggage.[88] Thus, the evidence demonstrates that a clear trail links high-ranking members of al-Qaida to one of the bomb-plot's key materiel inputs.

Individuals affiliated with al-Baqi also seem to have played a secondary logistical role, by introducing Khyam to other like-minded Londoners, who then provided the team with logistical assistance. Specifically, Babar testified that al-Baqi gave orders to Mohammed Quayyum Khan (a.k.a. "Q"), a part-time cab driver based in near-by Luton, who was reportedly instrumental in bringing Omar Bakri Mohammed, the founder of al-Muhajiroun, to the Luton Mosque.[89] Given Khyam and Mahmood's one-time connection to Omar Bakri's organization, Quayyum Khan may have played an early role in their indoctrination into fundamentalist Islam.

It is, however, clearer that Quayyum Khan introduced Khyam to Mohammed Sidique Khan,[90] a teacher's aide in the London schools, who shared Khyam's radical views, and who would gain dubious renown in 2005 for suicide-bombing the London Underground.[91] Quayyum Khan claims to have known the pair only as the result of an unsuccessful effort to establish an Islamic charity to benefit the needy in Pakistan, but the extent and nature of Sidique Khan's subsequent logistical interactions with Khyam belie this claim, though it is worth noting that British investigators were never able to pin any meaningful charges on Quayyum Khan.[92]

Specifically, in February 2004, Sidique Khan and Shehzad Tanweer, a 22 year-old British citizen of Pakistani origin who Sidique Khan had come to know through camping trips and other _youth counseling' activities, and who would later serve as another of the suicide-bombers in the July 7, 2005, attacks on London,[93] ran errands around the city alongside Khyam. The trio's stops included an Internet café, where they downloaded jihadist propaganda, and a hardware store, where they presumably investigated the acquisition of supplies for the impending fertilizer bombing.[94] That same month, Sidique Khan was also present at a meeting that Khyam, Mahmood, and Akbar held with the Canadian technical expert, Khawaja.[95] In short, the evidence suggests that Sidique Khan and Tanweer logistically supported Khyam's bombing attempt.

With this pair's assistance, Khyam's team made significant progress toward conducting an attack. Garcia had acquired nearly half a ton of fertilizer,[96] which they stored in a storage unit that Akbar's step-cousin, Nabeel Hussain, unwittingly rented on Khyam's behalf.[97] Moreover, the team was still in possessing of the aluminum powder they had acquired from Babar. After receiving a telephone call from a suspicious employee at the storage unit, the police were able to surreptitiously replace the plotters' fertilizer with an inert substitute,[98] but, even if only briefly, Khaym's team had acquired the majority of the components necessary to build a large bomb.

Thus, the logistics of the operation ultimately demonstrate that this was a viable plot that posed a meaningful threat to London.

The record has remained silent on the plot's specific sources of funding, but assessing the cost of fertilizer demonstrates that the plot, while dangerous, required little, if any, financial support from abroad. Because different crops require different nourishment, the nitrogen content of commercially available fertilizers varies depending on purpose. Cost varies accordingly, but none of the options are particularly expensive.[99] Circa 2004, prices ranged between $160 per ton for fertilizer with a nitrogen concentration of 21 percent, to $250 per ton for fertilizer with a nitrogen concentration of 46 percent.[100] Thus, if the plotters opted for the more expensive, more concentrated fertilizer, they would have been able to purchase the key chemical component of their bomb for approximately $125. Given that the aluminum powder came to the team free of cost via Babar's efforts, and given that the team's other expenses, such as storage space, were minimal, the evidence suggests that the entire operation could have been conducted for under $1,000.

Even if this estimate is off by a factor of five, the plotters would have been able to pay for the attack on their own using savings and lines of credit. It is certainly possible that an al-Qaida leader handed the plotters a wad of cash before they departed Pakistan, but there is no reason to make a priori assumptions about al-Qaida's role in the plot's funding. Ultimately, the low cost of the operation dictates that the plotters were likely financially independent of al-Qaida or any other outside organization.

5.2.3 TRAINING

As with aspects of the plot's logistics, al-Qaida's hand was evident in the team's training. When Khyam and Sidique Khan departed for Pakistan in 2003 (it is not clear if they traveled together or on separate occasions), Quayyum Khan, the British-based subordinate of al-Qaida leader Nashwan al-Baqi, reportedly arranged to have someone meet them at the airport in Karachi.[101] Moreover, in 2003, Mohammed Junaid Babar, the fixer who also worked for Nashwan al-Baqi, helped to establish a training facility in Malakand, Pakistan, where Khyam, Garcia, Mahmood, Amin, and Akbar trained after deciding to attack the United Kingdom during the planning meeting at Mahmood's home.[102]

They were soon joined by Khawaja and Sidique Khan, as well as Shujah Mahmood, Khyam's now 16 year-old brother, who was so naïve that he expected that jihadist training ~~w~~would be marshmallows and the whole camping thing," and so ill-prepared for the rigors of the experience that he spent every night in tears, literally crying for his mother.[103] Therefore, although Khyam had training ties to other organization by virtue of his earlier time in Kashmir and Afghanistan, and although Tanweer did not attend the Malakand camp, it is abundantly clear that al-Qaida provided the 2004 plotters with the knowledge necessary fulfill their vision of jihad.

Although the 9/11 attacks were successful and the 2004 plot failed when police interrupted it, there are no grounds to conclude that Khyam's team was of appreciably lower quality than its predecessor. Shujah Mahmood, who British courts ultimately acquitted of all terror charges,[104] was admittedly hapless, but then the limited language skills of several of the 9/11 hijackers demonstrate that they were poorly equipped for a mission in the West, and Khyam's associates also include a mathematician and a computer engineer. Simply put, Khyam's team had the technical skills and the materiel necessary to complete the attack. Rather than the sort of degradation of quality evidenced in the differences between the 1998 embassy bombing-team and the 2002 Mombasa team, the 2004 attempt to bomb London failed because alert staff members at the storage center where the team stashed their fertilizer became concerned and phoned the police, thereby initiating the chain of events that led to the plotters' arrest.[105]

While the quality of the teams used in the 2001 and 2004 operations did not degrade, the nature of their respective relationships to al-Qaida did. Al-Qaida provided direct logistical and training support to Khyam's team and thus remained strongly involved in the 2004 plot, but the extent of this role was less than in the 9/11 attacks. Khyam's attack-team demonstrated significant aspects of self-organization and attempted the attack without the same degree of high-level guidance bin Laden and KSM provided to the 9/11 hijackers by personally planning several aspects of the 2001 attack. Thus, Khaym's plot suggests that al-Qaida's control over its Western hit squad had begun to break down; al-Qaida was no longer the bureaucratic hierarchy that existed circa 2001.

Moreover, the nature of the 2004 plotter's relationship with al-Qaida was fundamentally different than that of their predecessors. Like the 1998 embassy-bombers, the 9/11 hijackers largely took direction from a hierarchical chain of command. The 2004 team, by comparison, seems to have viewed al-Qaida more as a means to an end. Khyam, who assembled and led the team, already had existing relationships with other extremist groups, by virtue of his time with Kashmiri militants and the Taliban, so it seems a stretch to assert that he found the ideology of bin Laden and al-Qaida uniquely appealing. Moreover, the plot's key strategic decision, namely the resolution to attack the United Kingdom, seems to have taken place independent of al-Qaida's direct influence. Therefore, the relationship between Khyam's team and bin Laden's organization was ultimately somewhat akin to that between a contractor and a client. However, because Sidique Khan and Tanweer, both of whom escaped arrest when investigators dismissed them as minor hangers-on rather than dangerous terrorists,[106] went-on to complete a suicide-attack against London that was more closely linked to al-Qaida, this case also demonstrates that bin Laden's organization was capable of stubborn strategic resolve, even as the extent of al-Qaida's control over operatives waned.

5.3 THE JULY 7, 2005, LONDON BOMBINGS

A little after 7.30 on the morning of July 7, 2005, four young men entered the Luton railway station and boarded a train bound for London, about 30 miles to the south. Three of them, 30 year-old Mohammed Sidique Khan, 22 year-old Shehzad Tanweer, and 18 year-old Hasib Hussain, were British-born Muslims of Pakistani descent. The fourth man, 19 year-old Jermaine Lindsay, was a Jamaican-born British citizen of African descent, who converted to Islam only five years earlier. Because the men were dressed casually and carried backpacks, which later events would reveal were filled with explosive-devices and icepacks to keep the bombs cool, the four stood-out from the suit-wearing commuters that comprised the bulk of the train‘s passengers, but not enough to cause alarm. Passengers would later state that the men looked like they were leaving town on a weekend camping trip.[107]

Because of delay on the line, the men did not reach King‘s Cross, the main train depot in London, until nearly an hour later, when CCTV cameras captured images of the four smiling happily, and witnesses reported that the men hugged on the platform before heading toward separate lines of the London Underground. At about 8.50am, three nearly simultaneous explosions took place. Tanweer was the first to attack; he detonated his bomb on a Circle Line train as it transited between Aldgate and Liverpool Stations, northeast of downtown London, killing himself and seven others, while wounding another 170. Sidique Khan, who was seated on another Circle Line train, detonated his bomb moments later, near Edgware Road station in Westminster, northwest of downtown, killing himself and six victims, as well as wounding nearly 165 people. Meanwhile, Lindsay bombed a third train on the Piccadilly Line as it traveled between King‘s Cross and Russell Square Station in Camden, just north of central London. Because Lindsay‘s train car was particularly crowded, his death toll was higher. In addition to himself, Lindsay killed 26 people and injured approximately 340.[108]

As his friends exploded, Hussain ambled out of King‘s Cross and onto nearby Euston Road. He used his mobile to make repeated calls to the other bombers, but to no avail. His next move suggests that he suffered technical difficulties; he reentered the station and bought a nine volt battery from a drugstore located on the main concourse. He then spent a few minutes in a nearby McDonalds, before catching a bus toward Euston Station, where he transferred to the No. 30 line, which was serviced by London‘s iconographic double-decker busses. At 9.47am, nearly an hour after the train bombings, Hussain detonated his weapon from the upper deck of the bus, killing himself and 13 others, while wounding more than 110 people.[109] The explosion took place on the edge of Tavistock Square, an urban green-space that until the day of the bombings was best known for containing monuments to non-violence, including a statue of Mahatma Gandhi and a memorial to conscientious objectors to war.[110]

Given the logistical ties that Sidique Khan and Tanweer held to Khyam, it is hardly a stretch to suggest that the July 7 bombings were an extension of the 2004 plot. However, the nature al-Qaida's involvement in the two operations' differed slightly. Because an al-Qaida bomb-maker seems to have closely choreographed the technical details of the 2005 attack, Sidique Khan's team benefitted from more direct planning support that Khyam's. The situation was reversed when it came to logistics; the 2005 bombers acquired all of their supplies independently and did not benefit from the type of direct logistical support that Khyam received when Babar provided aluminum powder. In terms of finance, the two operations seem to have been similarly independent; there is little evidence to suggest that either attack-team benefitted from the sort of direct cash transfers that sustained the 9/11 hijackers. Similarly, both teams benefitted from comparable levels of al-Qaida training. Although the details of al-Qaida's involvement in Sidique Khan's attack were not identical to its role in Khyam's failed plot, bin Laden's organization played an analogous role in both operations. Ultimately, both the 2004 fertilizer bomb-plot and the July 7 bombings blended aspects of self-organizing terrorism with unambiguous organizational support from al-Qaida.

5.3.1 PLANNING

Given the extent and nature of Sidique Khan and Tanweer's involvement in the failed 2004 plot, it is hardly a stretch to conclude that the 2005 bombings were a strategic extension of the decision to strike London made at Waheed Mahmood's home in the spring of 2003. Thus, it would be mistaken to attribute the conceptualization of the 2005 attack to al-Qaida, because it seems that Sidique Khan and Tanweer were like promising young athletes, who began playing on the varsity squad after injuries removed starting players from the line-up. In short, it seems that the men were merely carrying on where their friends had failed.

Even though the idea to attack London does not seem to have originated with al-Qaida, the organization's involvement in both operations demonstrates that attacking London had been a priority the terror group since at least 2003. To mix metaphors, al-Qaida's strategic involvement in the July 7 attack was somewhat akin to venture capitalism. The organization did not generate the goal, but provided substantial support to an objective that leaders believed would provide substantial returns.

Given this context, it seems most likely that specific operational planning for the July 7 attacks began in earnest following the demise of the fertilizer-bomb plot. In November 2004, a few months after the dust had settled from Khyam's arrest, Sidique Khan returned to Pakistan. This time, he brought Tanweer along; a CCTV camera in Karachi's airport even captured images of the pair as they deplaned from the same Turkish Airlines flight.[111] The contacts the pair made while abroad suggest that they made the trip in the hopes of acquiring the skill and knowledge necessary to succeed where Khyam's team had failed.

[111] Luke Harding and Rosie Cowan, "Pakistan militants linked to London attacks: Two bombers travelled together, documents show: Leader of plot also said to have visited Israel," The Guardian (London), July 19, 2005.

Sidique Khan and Tanweer's most telling interactions were with Abu Obaidah al-Masri, an innovative Egyptian bomb-maker who is credited with designing the types of detonators used in the July 7 attacks.[112] It is difficult to overstate the significance of this technical innovation; an official British inquiry into the bombings would later conclude that at the time of the attacks the design of the detonators "was unique in the UK and possibly worldwide."[113] Since members of the US intelligence community identified Abu Obaidah as one of al-Qaida's senior operational commanders and a close confidant of Ayman al-Zawahiri,[114] there is little doubt that bin Laden's organization created new technology in furtherance of the July 7 bombings. In short, even though al-Qaida did not come-up with the idea to bomb London, the organization was responsible for the most important technical aspect of the attacks' planning.

However, the evidence suggests that the suicide-operatives planned the tactical details of the attack on their own. For example, in December 2004, Jermaine Lindsay reconnoitered possible targets in London; he spent more than 40 minutes walking around King's Cross Station, before he met Hasib Hussain and two other friends for a day of "sightseeing," that included stops at attractions such as the Eye of London, the British Museum of Natural History, and the London Aquarium.[115] But since Lindsay and Hussain's friends were later acquitted of conspiring with the July 7 bombers, while being simultaneously convicted for conspiring to receive terror training,[116] it is difficult to judge exactly who was involved in the reconnaissance work, and precisely when this process began.

The date of the final planning preparations is comparatively clearer. Nine days before the July 7 bombers launched their attack, they conducted a dry run of the operation. After analyzing footage obtained from more than 80,000 CCTV cameras, investigators unearthed images dating from June 29 of the team at both the Luton train station, from which they would depart on the morning of the bombings, and King's Cross in London. The obvious conclusion is that they were familiarizing themselves with the layout of King's Cross and investigating to see if any security measures had been put in place since Lindsay's earlier trip to the station.[117]

Despite the preparation evidenced by this reconnaissance trip, it is important not to overstate the quality of the tactical planning. None of the sites that the July 7 bombers targeted were critical pieces of infrastructure, and with the partial exception of Lindsay, none of the bombers struck particularly crowded locations. Consequently, Richard Barnes, who headed London's police board before serving as the city's deputy mayor, argued that bombers were ―totally incompetent."[118] If they had known what they were doing, Barnes believes they would have caused a much higher death toll and would have chosen ―strategic points in London that would have ground the city to a halt for months, rather than hours."[119] Ultimately, the potential impact of the new technology that al-Qaida created in advancement of the July 7 attacks was mitigated by flawed tactical planning.

5.3.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Because a great deal of information on the July 7 attack died with the suicide-bombers, it is impossible to fully reconstruct the finances underlying the attack. With this caveat, it seems that Sidique Khan used two means to provide for the bulk of his team's expenses. Some of the money came from Sidique Khan's legitimate income, which he obtained working as a well-liked teacher's aide as a primary school in Leeds.[120] However, a larger share of the money seems to have been obtained via bank fraud. Specifically, Sidique Khan borrowed the equivalent of about 18,000 USD in cash from HSBC Bank, with no intention of every repaying the debt.[121] Given that the attack was a low-cost affair—some media sources put the total expenditures as low as a 900 USD,[122] while open-source 'forensic' inquiries estimate the cost at the equivalent of about 13,000 USD[123]—Sidique Khan's funds likely met the needs of the attack without additional supplement. However, it is worth noting that the team may have had substantially greater financial resources at its disposal; a man who appears in the open-source record on as "Ausman," and who purportedly trained with Sidique Khan and Tanweer in 2004, obtained the equivalent of 41,000 USD in fraudulent loans, by posing as the owner of a construction firm,[124] but it is not known how much, if any, of these funds went towards the July 7 operation.

Saudi authorities posited a third (and less likely) possible source of funding: direct transfers from al-Qaida. Younis Mohammed Ibrahim al-Hayari and Abdel Karim al-Mejati, a pair of Moroccan jihadists who died in separate gunfights with the Saudi police in 2005, purportedly transferred money to the bombing-team in the months preceding the attacks.[125] Even if this allegation proves true—it is worth noting that none of the official British inquiries into these attacks make matching claims—then the financial patterns of the July 7 attacks still differed significantly from those witnessed in the 9/11 attacks, because the British team received fewer transfers and provided some of their own funding, while the 9/11 hijackers were entirely dependent on disbursements from al-Qaida paymasters. In short, any role that al-Qaida played in funding Sidique Khan's attack was limited.

While the extent of al-Qaida's role in financial role in the July 7 attacks is still open to a modicum of debate, it is clear that the organization played no role in assembling the bombing-team. Like Khyam before him, Sidique Khan presented bin Laden's organization with a ready-made attack-team, assembled from individuals with whom he had previous association. He met all of the other bombers before he and Tanweer departed for South Asia and began planning the attack in earnest. Moreover, Sidique Khan's relationships also likely predate his training with Khyam in 2003, though the timeline is less clear regarding this second point in relation to Hussain and Lindsay.

Sidique Khan's relationship with Tanweer had the longest histroy. Shiv Malik, a BBC journalist who conducted extensive interviews with Sidique Khan's surviving relatives, asserts that the pair ~~–ar~~e thought to have known each other since childhood."[126] By 2001, the relationship also had a functional dimension, because Sidique Khan, who had been using the basement of Leeds' Hardy Street Mosque as a youth center and gymnasium, moved his Islamic outreach program into empty attic space above the Tanweer family's fish-and-chip shop following a dispute with the Mosque's board of trustees.[127] Given that Sidique Khan was concurrently involved in recruiting young Muslims from the Manchester area to serve as mujahideen in Afghanistan—his partners in this endeavor would later suicide-bomb a tavern in Tel Aviv[128]— Tanweer's role in the youth center's relocation demonstrates that he was likely actively involved in jihadist recruiting approximately four years prior to the 2005 attacks.

Sidique Khan's relationship with Hasib Hussain, the Tavistock bus-bomber, dated to no later than 2003 and also flowed through Tanweer. Hussain's older brother, Imran, regularly played cricket with Tanweer—they even had a game the day before the 2005 bombing—and younger brother Hasib sometimes joined them. Thus, Hussain had known Tanweer since childhood, and after Tanweer made introductions to Sidique Khan, Hussain began to take part in the pair's _youth outreach' activities. Moreover, Sidique Khan began to visit the Hussain family home regularly. However, the family asserts that Sidique Khan was somewhat covert in his radicalization of Hussain. Imran was present during many of Sidique Khan's visits and asserts that ~~he~~ was doing all of that brainwashing and not uttering a word about it," though Imran's characterization may simply be an attempt to distance himself from his brother's radicalism.[129] Regardless, it is clear that Hussain found his way into jihad because of interactions that he had on the cricket field and in his family's living room, rather than as the result of al-Qaida's direct influence.

[129] Dave Higgins, "Bus bomber 'must have been brainwashed,' say family, Press Association, August 2, 2005.

The nature of Jermaine Lindsay's relationship with Sidique Khan remains somewhat enigmatic. Unlike the other bombers, Lindsay was not from Leeds. Since immigrating to Britain with his mother as a toddler, he had lived in Huddersfield, about 20 miles to the southeast. Moreover, Lindsay was a Jamaican of African descent and had not converted to Islam until 2000.[130] Consequently, he was not part of the same Pakistani community as the other bombers and lacked the overlapping friendship circles evident in Hussain's recruitment. Instead, a radical preacher named Abdullah al-Faisal seems to have introduced Lindsay to Sidique Khan.[131]

Al-Faisal shared many aspects of Lindsay's background. For example, both were black, both were Jamaican-born, and both were converts from Christianity. Consequently, Lindsay found al-Faisal's message, which included exhortations to kill all non-Muslims,[132] uniquely appealing, especially after Lindsay's mother moved abroad in 2002 and left her son feeling abandoned and alone.[133] Although al-Faisal was jailed in 2003 on charges of inciting murder,[134] he preached twice in Leeds before his detention.[135] Given Sidique Khan's prominence among that city's Islamists, it is hardly far-fetched to conclude that their paths crossed. Therefore, if al-Faisal introduced Lindsay to Sidique Khan, it occurred no later than 2003—about a year before the specific planning of the July 7 attacks began. Even if al-Faisal lacked a role in the introductions, Lindsay's relationship to Khan can still be dated to this period, because, in 2003, Lindsay and his pregnant wife relocated to the Leeds area from Huddersfield, and he then became a fixture in the youth center that the other July 7 bombers frequented.[136] While it is clear that Sidique Khan had a long history of involvement in radical Islam, it ultimately seems that he had recruited the other bombes to his cause before he began operating in close association with al-Qaida.

Beyond manpower, Sidique Khan's team was also independent of bin Laden's organization in the acquisition of materials. The bombers began collecting supplies as early as February 2005, when Hasib Hussain and Shehzad Tanweer purchased 5 liter drums of "Growth Technology Liquid Oxygen," a hydrogen peroxide-based solvent used to clean hydroponic systems, from a pair of specialized horticulture stores in York.[137] By early April, the team had acquired its first safe house, and in late May, Jermaine Lindsay used a false name to sub-let an apartment at 18 Alexandra Grove, a dwelling that soon became the team's primary bomb-factory.[138]

Because police found all four of the suicide-bombers' fingerprints in the Alexandra Grove apartment, it seems clear that bomb-making was a team affair. Moreover, the police also found a few electric hotplates, an assortment of pots and pans, and four respirators, which were necessary because the explosives-manufacturing process produced fumes so caustic that they bubbled paint inside the apartment and killed shrubbery outside the window used as a vent. When viewed in sum, the evidence suggests that the men likely took turns stirring the pot to boil-down the Liquid Oxygen to explosive concentrations.[139]

However, Sidique Khan seems to have played a leading role in the bomb-making process. Handwriting analysis showed that he was the one who wrote the recipe that described the correct quantity of chemicals to mix with organic filler material (the bombers chose black pepper) in order to produce an incendiary explosion.[140] He also likely had some outside advice; investigators determined that Sidique Khan used a disposable cell phone to make several calls to Pakistan during the explosives-manufacturing phase of the team's preparations.[141] The logical inference is that he spoke to master bomb-maker Abu Obaidah about the technical details of the process. Even with this guidance, it is clear that the July 7 team conducted the most important logistical task necessary to complete the bombing, namely the construction of explosive devices, with a high degree of independence.

5.3.3 TRAINING

Al-Qaida's clearest role in the July 7 bombings came in the instruction of the attack-team. It seems clear that Abu Obaidah not only planned the technical aspects of the attack, but also that he trained Sidique Khan and Tanweer in bomb-making. And if Abu Obaidah was ultimately the recipient of the calls Sidique Khan made from his burner phone during the bomb-making process, as the context of the evidence suggests, then this training extended well after the July 7 bombers left Pakistan.

Moreover, Hasib Hussain, the Tavistock bus-bomber, also likely trained alongside Tanweer and Sidique Khan. When his compatriots arrived in Pakistan in the fall of 2004, Hussain had already been in the country for about three months.[142] There is no direct evidence that he joined his friends at the same training camp,[143] but given the trio's preexisting ties, it seems reasonable to assume that the men would have made every effort to train together.

[140] Ibid.
[141] Coroner's Report.
[142] "Pakistan agencies pinpoint visits of London blast suspects," BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political, July 18, 2005.

While the evidence of Hussain's direct training ties to al-Qaida is mildly speculative, it is clear that Lindsay had no comparable experience. The open-source record contains no evidence that he ever trained abroad. Ultimately, it is darkly ironic that the least experienced member of the July 7 team was the most successful suicide attacker; half of the attack's 52 fatalities resulted from Lindsay's bomb.

5.3.4 SUMMATION

It is difficult to gauge the quality of the attack-team in comparison to its predecessor. Gone are the mathematician and computer engineer that were present in 2004, but then again, also gone are hapless individual like Shujah Mahmood. Indeed, until their involvement in radical Islam, the July 7 bombers' lacked outstanding features. In its official inquiry into the bombings, the British House of Commons best summarized the four's backgrounds, calling them ―largely unexceptional" and noting that with the partial exception of the convert Lindsay, ―Little distinguishes their formative experiences from those of many others of the same generation, ethnic origin and social background." In short, it seems that average men comprised the July 7 attack-team.

However, the team had some experience in jihad. Tanweer and Sidique Khan not only trained abroad, but also participated in Khyam's failed attack in 2004. Though a newcomer in comparison to this pair, Hussain also likely trained with al-Qaida. Therefore, even though Lindsay lacked formal instruction in terrorism, the team's training ties to al-Qaida dictate that bin Laden's organization played a strong role in the bombing, especially when viewed alongside Abu Obaidah al-Masri's involvement in the technical planning of the attack.

Yet, it would inaccurate to state that al-Qaida directed this operation with the same degree of hierarchical control that the organization exhibited in the 9/11 attacks. Overlaps in personnel suggest that this plot was an extension of Khyam's self-conceived plot to bomb London, rather than a _new' idea conceptualized by al-Qaida leaders. Though the slight possibility of al-Qaida funding remains, it is clear that Sidique Khan's team self-financed the majority of the attack, and lacked even the small amount of direct logistical support that Khyam's team received, much less the comprehensive backing that al-Qaida provided to the 9/11 hijackers. However, the July 7 bombers received a greater degree of technical planning assistance than Khyam's team, while both groups of plotters were responsible for (poorly) planning the tactical details of their operations. Therefore, the details of al-Qaida's involvement in the plots differ, but the scale of the organization's involvement in these events was broadly equivalent.

Ultimately, both Khyam and Sidique Khan's teams self-organized several aspects of their attack, while simultaneously benefitting from aspects of organizational support provided by al-Qaida. Indeed, the evidence strongly suggests that the July 7 bombings would never have come to fruition without both of these structural components: Sidique Khan's informal, pre-existing relationships provided the operation with manpower and local knowledge, while al-Qaida provided organizational resources in the forms of technical expertise and training. While this blended structure might suggest an impressive organizational adaptation if viewed in isolation, subsequent events serve to demonstrate that the July 7 bombings are better viewed as a point on devolutionary timeline, because later al-Qaida-linked hit squads that targeted the West continued to lack access to al-Qaida's financial and logistical resources, and were comprised of low-caliber personnel, who on average received less training and had less experience than their predecessors.

5.4 THE JULY 21, 2005, FAILED BOMBING OF LONDON

As Londoners attempted to return to normal life in the aftermath of the July 7 bombings, another attack-team prepared to strike the city. On July 21, 2005, just 14 days after Sidique Khan's bombing, a group of young Muslims, most of them East Africans who had lived in Britain for years, targeted five sites around London, four of which again involved the city's mass transit system. Specifically, Yasin Hassan Omar, a 24 year-old Somali who first arrived in Britain thirteen years earlier as a refugee,[144] attempted to detonate a hydrogen peroxide-based explosive device, hidden inside of a backpack, on a train at the Warren Street station of the London Underground, fairly near the terminal where Hasib Hussain had transferred to the Tavistock Square-bound bus on the morning of July 7.[145]

Two of Omar's co-conspirators made almost identical bombing attempts on other trains. CCTV cameras captured images of Ramzi Mohammed,[146] a 24 year-old Somali who fled to Britain via Kenya in 1998 to escape Somalia's civil war,[147] as he attempted to suicide-bomb a train at the Stockwell station, in the heart of inner London.[148] Meanwhile, Hussein Osman, a 28 year-old Ethiopian, whose real name was Hamdi Adus Isaac and who had adopted the name Osman in the hopes of achieving refugee status when he arrived in Britain in the 1990s,[149] attempted to detonate a bomb while onboard a train at the station in Shepherd's Bush, a bustling residential neighborhood in West London.

As in the July 7 attack, this group of plotters also sought to target London's famous double-decker busses. Muktar Said Ibrahim, a 27 year-old Eritrean-born British citizen, who had been living in England since 1992,[150] tried to suicide-bomb the No. 26 bus in Hackney, in the northeast corner of inner London.[151]

The fifth and most enigmatic member of the July 21 team seems to have gotten cold feet and abandoned his bomb in the brush of Little Wormwood Scrubs, an urban green-space located in West London.[152] This bomber called himself Manfor Kwaku Asiedu and was about 32 years old, but the details of his background are exceptionally difficult to pin-down, because he used multiple false identities. His attorney claims the bomber's real name is Sumaila Abubakhari, but when the bomber arrived in Britain in late 2003, he used a passport bearing the name Georges Nanak Marquye. After losing this document in a house fire, the bomber assumed the name Asiedu as a matter of practicality and convenience; he needed an identity, and the real Asiedu had previously lived at the same address, before being involuntarily confined to a psychiatric hospital, placing him in a position where he was unlikely to learn of the identity theft.[153] Like his identity, Asiedu's reasons for abandoning the attack at the last minute remain unclear, because he was heavily involved in other stages of the operation, most notably the acquisition of materials.

The vagaries of Asiedu's involvement notwithstanding, the attack-team attempted a coordinated strike. Their bombs were intended to detonate between 12.30pm and 1.00pm, during London's busy lunch hour,[154] and while the detonators successfully exploded, the mix of hydrogen peroxide and chapatti flour that constituted the main explosive charge of the bomb failed to ignite.[155] London was saved from another dramatic loss of life only by the poor chemistry skills of the members of the July 21 team; they failed to concentrate the hydrogen peroxide-mixture to the level necessary to make it explosive.[156]

Although British officials initially stressed that "July 7 and July 21 seem not be related,"[157] the currently available evidence demonstrates that these two attacks were linked by planning and training ties. More specifically, the two groups of attackers adopted identical methodologies because they shared links to Abu Obaidah al-Masri. But despite this prominent similarity, there are also substantial differences between the two attack-teams. Most glaringly, only a single member of the July 21 team trained abroad, though other members of the team received some exceptionally rudimentary experience from British-based training. Moreover, the July 21 team's general lack of experience showed; the group was sometimes buffoonish in its efforts toward terrorism. Therefore, although the attacks of July 7 and July 21 were separated by only two weeks, and although both events shared ties to al-Qaida, tremendous gaps existed in the quality of the respective attack-teams. Ultimately, the latter event marks the point at which the devolutionary trends that began in the aftermath of 9/11 overwhelmed al-Qaida's efforts to attack the West using hit squads. From this attack forward, the odds that al-Qaida will successfully conduct a true mass-casualty attack in the West have been substantially reduced, though not completely eliminated.

5.4.1 PLANNING

It is difficult to pin-down the planning details of the July 21 attacks, primarily because the operation's key members lied persistently during their trial. For example, Ibrahim repeated claimed that the team never intended to detonate the bombs. According to his account, the entire operation was an elaborate hoax designed to protest Britain's participation in the Iraq War. Ibrahim never wavered from this story, even after prosecutors noted that there would have been no need for the team to use viable explosive materials, like concentrated hydrogen peroxide, if the weapons were not intended to detonate.[158] Owing to the ambiguities created by the bombers' deliberate attempts at deception, many facets of the operation remain somewhat obscure.

For example, it remains unclear when the July 21 team first conceptualized the idea to bomb Britain. Unlike Sidique Khan and Tanweer, none of the July 21 bombers had any overt links to Khyam's failed 2004 attack; therefore, the July 21 attack does not seem to have been a continuation of this earlier plot. However, this should not suggest that the July 21 attack was entirely independent of the earlier operations, because in the fall of 2004, Ibrahim was in Pakistan at the same time as Sidique Khan and Tanweer. Given that the bombs used on July 7 and July 21 shared the same unique detonator design and that the two attacks were the first known usages of hydrogen peroxide-based bombs in the United Kingdom, it is almost certain that Abu Obaidah, the enigmatic al-Qaida bomb-maker, planned the technical details of both attacks.[159] Ultimately, it seems that the two July 2005 attacks on London were independently inspired, before coming together in Pakistan under Abu Obaidah.

The tactical planning of the July 21 attack is similarly ambiguous. No information has emerged regarding if and when the bombers conducted specific surveillance on the transportation sites they attacked. However, the evidence clearly demonstrates that the July 21 bombings were not a simple copy-cat attack. Ibrahim's team clearly began planning its strike well ahead of the July 7 bombings, because its members began to amass bombing materials in the spring of 2005, several months before Sidique Khan's attack.

Moreover, the July 21 bombers apparently lacked any advanced knowledge of the timing of Sidique Khan's attack. They apparently learned of the event from the same source as the rest of London: the news. Ibrahim's team may have adjusted their plans after witnessing the details of the July 7 attack, but the only planning detail that is crystal clear in relation to the failed July 21 attacks is that the bombers had decided to target London long before July 7.[160]

5.4.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

The manpower necessary to conduct the bombing was assembled long before a specific plot ever began. Ibrahim, who played the most important role in the plot, found his way to radical Islam in the late 1990s, after spending his youth pursuing a life of petty crime and drug use. In 1996, he was part of a gang that British prosecutors convicted of a series of knife-point robberies. Ibrahim was exceptionally angry that, as the only member of the gang older than 18, his five year sentence was harsher than those handed-down to his co-defendants. Friends speculate that this bitterness made him an easy mark for prison jihadists, who apparently recruited Ibrahim to their cause, because when he emerged from detention on an early parole in 1998, he had become a fundamentalist, who wore traditional Muslim headdress and facial hair.[161]

He began attending radical mosques, and was reportedly a devoted follower of Abu Hamza al-Masri, the hook-handed preacher who presided over London's infamous Finsbury Park Mosque in the late 1990s.[162] Ibrahim soon fell under the influence of Atilla Ahmet, who served as Abu Hamza's deputy imam, and Mohammed Hamid, a former crack addict and occasional member of the Finsbury Park congregation, who became radicalized during his recovery and frequently preached on the street at London's Speaker's Corner. More specifically, by 2003, Ibrahim had become a regular attendee of the fundamentalist study sessions Hamid conducted at his East London home, where Ahmet served as a frequent guest-lecturer. It was through this group that Ibrahim formed relationships with four of the other men involved in the failed July 21 bombing.[163]

Ramzi Mohammed and Hussein Osman were already members of the study-circle when Ibrahim began attending.[164] Although a native of Somalia, Mohammed was only nominally Muslim when he arrived to Britain with his family in 1998. He drank and chased women as a teenager, but developed a more serious interest in Islam circa 2003, reportedly after hearing Hamid preach at Speaker's Corner,[165] and soon began attending the street-preacher's study sessions.[166] Osman's path to radicalization followed a similar trajectory; as a teenager, he was a devotee of hip-hop music and favored himself a ladies' man.[167] Circa 2000, he and Adel Yahya, a high school friend who would later help the bombing-team acquire chemicals, developed a deeper interest in religion,[168] and the pair soon began attending services at Finsbury Park mosque,[169] and then Hamid's study sessions.[170]

In time, Yassin Omar also joined this group.[171] However, his involvement with radical Islam seems to have predated that of his co-conspirators, because Omar was drawn to fundamentalism while still an impressionable high school student. Although a Somali, he was raised by white, Christian foster parents after arriving in Britain, but his guardians state that he was "not comfortable with boundaries and rules" that they set.[172] Former high school classmates stated that Omar had supported Palestinian causes since he first arrived in Britain.[173] Thus, it seems that some combination of teenage rebellion and preexisting affinity for Islamic causes combined to push him toward radicalism, and by 2000 Omar ideologically supported the Taliban.[174] Concurrently, Omar began attending Finsbury Park mosque, and eventually fell into Hamid and Atillah's orbit.[175]

The depth of Hamid's involvement in the team's recruitment seems difficult to overstate. His ties to Ibrahim, in particular, were exceptionally close. The men were even arrested together in October 2004, when Hamid became aggressive to pedestrians passing by the Islamic bookstand that the pair ran on London's Oxford Street. After insulting the police officer dispatched to the scene, Hamid claimed to have a bomb in his possession and refused to provide police with his real name, instead referring to himself as "Osama bin London."[176]

While this event serves to demonstrate the depth of the bond that existed between Ibrahim and Hamid, it also demonstrates the flamboyance with which the plotters sometimes voiced their support for radical Islam. It was not a single isolated incident. In the spring of 2005, during a Friday prayer session, Omar got into a screaming match with an imam who preached that Palestinian suicide bombings were a violation of Islam.[177] Equally telling were the claims made by Hamid's preaching partner, Ahmet, who reportedly bragged widely that he was "the number one al-Qaida [member] in Europe,"[178] and who once told TV reporters that he loved bin Laden "more than himself," before stating that the casualties of the 9/11 attacks were a "drop in the ocean." Indeed, he was so proud of these performances that he burned copies of the interviews to DVD and distributed them to friends and family.[179] In short, the plotters and their associates were indiscrete in voicing their support for al-Qaida.

Despite Ahmet's claims to the contrary, his personal history suggests that he lacked any direct interactions with the organization's operational leaders. A Londoner born of Turkish-Cypriot heritage, Ahmet went by "Alan" and made his living as a youth-league soccer coach throughout the bulk of the 1990s. Moreover, he was nominally Christian until 1998, when he converted to Islam.[180] The record contains no evidence that he trained abroad or interacted operationally with members of bin Laden's organization. In short, it is clear that Ahmet was a committed Islamist, but it remains to be proven that he held membership in al-Qaida, much less that he was the organization's top European member. Consequently, the currently available evidence suggests that it would be exaggerative to attribute bin Laden's organization with a direct role in the recruitment of the July 21 bombers.

The only member of the team who lacked known ties to Ahmet and Hamid was Asiedu. The evidence is somewhat vague regarding his recruitment, but since he did not enter Britain until 2003, it seems that he was a later edition to the bombing team. Because Asiedu made his living as a handyman at the Finchley Mosque, where Ibrahim and Omar sometimes worshipped, the pair appears to have directly recruited the Ghanaian. Within a few weeks of the trio's first interaction, Asiedu was invited to move into 58 Curtis House, the eighth-floor, government-subsidized apartment where Omar lived in the north London borough of Enfield.[181]

While the absence of a detailed open-source history of Ahmet's life dictates that a modicum of ambiguity continues to surround al-Qaida's role in procuring manpower for the July 21 bombings, it is exceptionally clear that bombers acquired the materiel necessary to conduct the attack on their own. Given Ibrahim's interactions with Abu Obaidah, it is unsurprising that the July 21 team's acquisitions followed a similar trajectory to those of Sidique Khan's team, though Ibrahim's group was at times less discrete in their purchases. The process of acquiring supplies began with Adel Yahya, the same 23 year-old Ethiopian whom Yasin Omar had befriended in high school. Yahya made a pair of trips to cosmetics suppliers in May and June of 2005, in order to investigate the best source of hydrogen peroxide. After speaking with store owners, he pegged hair bleach as the best choice, and the team soon began making purchases.[182]

By the time that Sidique Khan's team struck in early July, Ibrahim's team had acquired 443 liters—more than 115 gallons—of beauty products that contained 18 percent hydrogen peroxide. The vast bulk of the purchases were made by Asiedu, though other team members often accompanied him to the stores. Moreover, it seems he always frequented the same sellers; court documents stipulate that all of the chemicals were obtained "from three shops in north London."[183] If these repeat purchases did not raise eyebrows—Asiedu reportedly tried to divert suspicion by claiming that he was a decorator who needed the supplies to bleach wood[184]—store owners should have been concerned when Asiedu and Ibrahim inquired during the course of one shopping trip about the possibility of buying hydrogen peroxide that was already concentrated to 60 or 70 percent.[185] In short, the July 21 team was as indiscreet in its acquisitions as it was about publically voicing its support for al-Qaida.

After acquiring the supplies, the July 21 followed manufacturing procedures that were almost identical to those employed by the Sidique Khan's team. At 58 Curtis House, the July 21 team converted a basic kitchen into a bomb factory[186] and used saucepans and electric stoves to boil-down their hair-care products in an effort to concentrate the peroxide to 70 percent, before mixing it with combustible organic material. In lieu of the black pepper Sidique Khan's team had used, the July 21 bombers chose chapatti flour,[187] which Ramzi Mohammed and Hussein Osman purchased on July 18.[188]

The police found fingerprints and other clues that proved that all of the July 21 bombers were involved in the manufacturing process, though a note containing instructions for an experiment to test the concentration of peroxide was found in Ibrahim's handwriting, suggesting that he may have led the bomb-making process.[189] In short, the means employed by the two London teams were almost indistinguishable, but this is hardly surprising given that they shared the same technical planner in Abu Obaidah al-Masri.

Why then did one team succeed where they other failed? The different material inputs that the two teams selected made no difference. Hydrogen peroxide concentrated from hair-care products is just as explosive as hydrogen peroxide concentrated from horticultural solvents, and the organic composition of chapatti flour versus ground pepper had no effect on the viability of the two teams' bombs.[190] Instead, the July 21 team's bombs failed to detonate because they were poor chemists. Ibrahim miscalculated during an experiment to determine the concentration of hydrogen peroxide, leaving the team's chemical product 12 percent shy of the threshold necessary to ensure detonation.[191] Given that he reportedly failed the General Certificate of Secondary Education in Maths, a standardized accreditation test given to British high school students, he may have been less than ideally suited to serve as the team's bomb-maker.[192] Some combination of ignorance and simple human error ultimately undermined the July 21 attack.

5.4.3 TRAINING

As with the July 7 attacks, al-Qaida's most direct role in the July 21 bombings took the form of training. In addition to planning the technical details of the failed attack, Abu Obaidah appears to have trained Ibrahim in bomb-making.[193] However, al-Qaida's involvement in the training of the July 21 bombers was less substantial than in both Khyam's 2004 plot and Sidique Khan's 2005 attack, because Ibrahim was the only member of his team who has been definitively linked to bin Laden's organization.

Other issues also mitigated the extent of al-Qaida's training ties to the July 21 attacks. For example, Ibrahim had vague training ties to other violent Islamists; he claimed to have trained with jihadists in the Sudan in 2003, though no one has been able to independently verify with whom.[194] More tellingly, Ibrahim's team self-trained in ways that previous attack-squads had not.

Like much of the recruitment and radicalization process, this training ran through Hamid. In May 2004, he took Ibrahim, Omar, Mohammed, Yahya, Osman, his young son, and several other men to the Lake District, in England's northwest corner, for what the Metropolitan Police Department called "military-style exercising."[195] Police photographed the men as they spent a couple of days drilling to prepare for jihad, but the value of this training is open to question, because it occurred without weapons. One member of the surveillance team testified that the men held "branches or sticks as though they were carrying rifles."[196]

Prior to the July 21 bombings, Hamid conducted at least two more training sessions in the region. The attack team did not participate in these to the same extent as they had the May 2004 trip, but Ibrahim did attend the final camping trip of that year, which was held in mid-August.[197] While Hamid continued to train aspiring jihadists even after the capture of the July 21 bombers, the single session of unarmed drilling that occurred in May 2004 constituted the only known training for four of the plot's participants.[198] Moreover, Asiedu had no demonstrable involvement in training of any type. Consequently, it is fair to conclude not only that al-Qaida played a substantially smaller role in preparing the July 21 bombers than it had in Khyam and Sidique Khan's operations, but also that the July 21 team was substantially less prepared for jihad that its predecessors.

5.4.4 SUMMATION

Although clearly linked to both Sidique Khan's bombing on July 7 and al-Qaida bomb-maker Abu Obaidah al-Masri, the July 21 differed substantially from previous attacks. Al-Qaida's involvement was less significant, and the quality of Ibrahim's team was demonstrably lower. Indeed, if not for the seriousness of their goals, the July 21 bombers would have had more in common with the Keystone Cops than with battle-hardened extremists: the bombers botched basic calculations during the explosives-manufacturing process; they trained with tree-branches in lieu of proper weapons; they were anything but covert and loudly proclaimed their allegiance to bin Laden; and they attracted tremendous attention to themselves while acquiring supplies by asking shopkeepers about the purchase of highly-concentrated hydrogen peroxide. Ultimately, the most surprising detail of the July 21 attack is that it nearly succeeded.

[198] Ibid.

While the gap in quality and preparation between this attack-team and previous al-Qaida hit squads is self-evident and profound, the problems endemic to the July 21 bombers did not spring from nowhere. Instead, they represented an admittedly large step in a downward progression from the specialized, fairly well-trained operatives that participated in the 9/11 attacks and the highly-educated, technically-skilled members of Omar Khyam's team, to the average men who perpetrated the July 7 bombings. In short, although the devolutionary patterns were slower to take shape among al-Qaida's Western hit squads than its non-Western attackers, by 2004 bin Laden's organization had hit a new low by supporting Ibrahim's ill-equipped, poorly staffed operation. Moreover, subsequent evidence suggests that patterns evident in al-Qaida's relationship with the failed July 21 bombing were not an aberrant incident involving an otherwise successfully adaptive organization, because they repeated in 2009, when al-Qaida supported Najibullah Zazi, the leader of another largely inept hit squad, in his attempt to attack New York.

5.5 THE 2009 PLOT AGAINST NEW YORK'S MASS TRANSIT SYSTEM

In 2009, Najibullah Zazi, a 24 year-old Afghan-American immigrant, plotted to attack New York City's subway system with the help of two high school friends:[199] Adis Medunjanin, a naturalized U.S. citizen of Bosnian birth who first came to New York at the age of 10 in 1994,[200] and Zarien Ahmedzay, an Afghan-born American citizen who also arrived in the country in the 1990s.[201] The men planned to simultaneously suicide-bomb three locations using homemade hydrogen peroxide-based explosives that they would carry onboard subway trains hidden inside of backpacks. However, the plot unraveled when Zazi fell under FBI surveillance and the attack team was forced to abandon their bombing just a few days prior to their planned mid-September strike.[202]

As the details of the case emerged, it became clear that Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay comprised an al-Qaida hit squad that had been sent to attack New York using tactics that mirrored those of the London bombers. However, the American team was far from capable. Although its members received training from al-Qaida, its quality was not particularly high, and the plotters received no demonstrable logistical or financial support from bin Laden's organization after returning to the U.S. Consequently, the attempt on New York constituted a minor threat that demonstrates the limited, but legitimate, danger that unsupported hit squads pose to the West.

5.5.1 PLANNING

At a strategic level, al-Qaida had been attempting to recruit a New York-based jihadist to attack the city since at least 2007 or 2008. For example, Bryant Neal Vinas, a native of Queens who converted to Islam in 2004,[203] left the United States in the fall of 2007 with the intention of joining the Afghan jihad and fighting against coalition forces in South Asia, but al-Qaida soon recruited him with the intention of attacking his home state.[204] The al-Qaida operatives with whom Vinas conspired included:

- Rashid Rauf,[205] a British citizen[206] and disciple of master bomb-maker Abu Obaidah al-Masri;[207]

- Abu Yahya al-Libi,[208] a radical Libyan cleric who became a prominent al-Qaida spokesman[209] after he and three other prisoners escaped from detention at America's Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan in July 2005;[210] and

- Mustafa Abu al-Yazid,[211] an Egyptian extremist whose involvement in jihad dates to at least 1981, when he took part in the assassination of Anwar Sadat, and whose involvement with al-Qaida dates to the early 1990s, when he served as an accountant for some of bin Laden's Khartoum-based businesses.[212]

Even as Vinas participated in attacks on coalition troops, these leaders probed him for information on the commuter rail line that runs between New York City and Long Island, a piece of transportation infrastructure that Vinas knew well because he had ridden it countless times as a commuter.[213] However, this initial plan was cut short when coalition troops captured Vinas in November 2008.[214]

Because Zazi's 2009 plot also involved at least one of the same planners and also aimed at New York City, it was essentially a continuation of the Vinas plot. Specifically, Zazi and his coconspirators met with Rauf and two other al-Qaida planners, Saleh al-Somali and Adnan G. el Shukrijumah, in September 2008,[215] shortly before Vinas' capture. Given that some media sources also allege that Vinas and Zazi co-attended at least one planning meeting with unnamed al-Qaida leaders,[216] the circumstantial evidence suggests that two New York-based plots were linked rather closely.

Moreover, Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay closely followed Vinas' path to al-Qaida. Like their predecessor, the trio of aspiring jihadists arrived in Pakistan in the hopes of fighting as insurgents for the Taliban and had to be actively recruited to al-Qaida. Zazi and his friends became convinced that they could best serve the Salafist cause by committing suicide-attacks in the West only after spending significant time with Rauf, al-Somali, and al-Shukrijumah.[217] Thus, in stark contrast to the self-conceived British plots, al-Qaida planners were the driving force that initiated these interlinked plots against New York. Zazi and his friends would likely have served the Taliban analogously to enlisted infantrymen if not for the influence of bin Laden's organization.

However, it is important not to overstate the extent of al-Qaida's organizational involvement in the planning of the 2009 subway plot. Some scholars, most notably Bruce Hoffman, have assumed that bin Laden personally signed-off on the Zazi operation.[218] Available open-source information contains no explicit evidence to support this claim. There are no demonstrable direct links between the planners of the 2009 plot and bin Laden, and given that at the time of the plot's planning, bin Laden communicated only intermittently through couriers in a deliberate attempt to isolate himself from al-Qaida's senior and mid-level members in the name of operational security,[219] it would have been logistically challenging, if not entirely infeasible, for the dissident Saudi to have directed the attack.

Moreover, since Hoffman's assessment of bin Laden's role in the Zazi plot appeared in an article titled "The Leaderless Jihad's Leader," Hoffman seemed more concerned with mocking Sageman's competing (and equally problematic) "leaderless" characterization of Salafist terrorism than with conducting impartial analysis. To be blunt, Hoffman viewed the available evidence through rose colored lenses in an attempt to justify his long-held beliefs about the primacy of bin Laden's role in the global jihad. Al-Qaida clearly played an organizational role in the planning of the attack, but conclusions attributing a direct role to the highest echelons of the organization are premature and likely exaggerate the extent of hierarchy that existed within al-Qaida circa 2008. The planning of the Zazi plot cannot be traced beyond Rauf, al-Somali, and el-Shukrijumah.

Even more importantly, these operatives' shared role did not extend beyond high-level strategy; instead, al-Qaida relied on Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay's knowledge of New York to plan the attack at a tactical level. Indeed, the men who recruited the trio to serve as suicide-bombers lacked the local knowledge necessary to effectively target the city. With the possible exception of el-Shukrijumah, who lived in Brooklyn for a few years in his very early childhood, when his father served as an assistant imam at Brooklyn's Farooque Mosque under the Blind Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman,[220] there is no evidence to suggest that the al-Qaida men who initiated the plot had spent any significant time in the five boroughs. Ahmedzay even claims that the strategists took a special interest in him because he had particularly detailed knowledge of the city, obtained from years spent working as a cab driver, and was thus in an ideal position to plan the practical details of the operation. Ultimately, the al-Qaida strategists offered little specific guidance to the American recruits and simply told them —to hit well-known structures and to maximize the number of casualties."[221]

Toward those ends, Ahmedzay reconnoitered several targets after the attack-team returned from training in South Asia in early 2009. Then, without any apparent input from al-Qaida leaders abroad, he and Zazi made the decision to target the subway.[222] Their reasoning was simple: they wanted to conduct the attack by the end of Ramadan, which concluded on September 21, 2009, and they believed that Zazi, who played the role of bomb-maker, simply did not have time enough to manufacture sufficient quantities of explosives to allow the team to target a larger structure without altering the schedule of their attack.[223] Thus, al-Qaida provided a general strategic vision, but the Queens-based plotters exercised tremendous latitude at the tactical level and used their local knowledge to select specific targets. Much, if not all, of the detailed planning was the work of Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay, rather than established members of al-Qaida.

5.5.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

For reasons that remain unclear, the three American plotters split-up when they returned to the United States in January 2009. Ahmedzay and Medunjanin returned to Queens, but Zazi left New York for Aurora, Colorado, a suburb of Denver where his aunt and uncle were already living, and took work driving a van for an airport shuttle service. None of the available court documents mention that he or any of the other plotters received cash payments from any of the al-Qaida leaders they met, so it seems that Zazi, relied primarily, if not entirely, on his meager earnings from the limo company to purchase the chemicals he used to concoct explosives. As he paid no living expenses while at his aunt and uncle's home (they eventually threw Zazi out for failure to pay rent), and because the supplies used in the construction of the bomb were all inexpensive,[224] the lack of financial support from al-Qaida did not represent a substantial barrier for the attack team to overcome. The bombing was ultimately well within the American team members' independent means.

In terms of specifics, Zazi acquired the precursor chemicals necessary to manufacture explosives from beauty supply warehouses located near his Colorado home. He obtained six 16 oz. bottles of Clairol's "Liquid Developer Clairoxide," a hydrogen peroxide-based hair lightening product, in late July. About a month later, he purchased a dozen 32 oz. bottles of a similar product, namely "Ms. Kay 40 Volume Liquid Developer," from the same retailer and was captured on the store's security cameras on both occasions.[225] As a young, heavily-bearded Afghan, Zazi was hardly the stereotypical buyer of large quantities of hair bleach, and the store's employees took notice of his unusual purchases. When they asked why he needed so much hydrogen peroxide, he reportedly quipped that he ―had a lot of girlfriends."[226]

Perhaps leery of attracting more suspicion, Zazi obtained additional materials through straw purchases. In July, an individual who court documents have yet to identify by name ―purchased a one-gallon container of a product containing 20% hydrogen peroxide" and ―an eight ounce bottle of acetone."[227] A second accomplice purchased another acetone-based product in early September, and a third man bought 32 oz. bottles of another brand of peroxide-based hair product, namely ―Ion Sensitive Scalp Developer," three times for Zazi in July and August.[228]

By examining the going prices of these products, it is easy to obtain a fairly accurate idea of just how affordable homemade explosives are. Acetone, which manicurists use to remove nail polish, sells in beauty stores for about $2.19 per 8 oz. bottle.[229] Similarly, online retailers list the Clairoxide developer at between $2.35[230] and $5.95[231] per 16 oz. bottle. Though the 32 oz. bottle of Ms. Kay developer is of identical concentration and is twice the size, it sells for comparable prices and can be obtained for $4.95 per bottle.[232] Nor is the Ion product prohibitively priced; it sells for around $5.49 per 32 oz. bottle.[233] Therefore, on average, the precursor chemicals that Zazi required sold for about 22 cents per ounce, and all of the chemicals that the plotters are known to have purchased could have been obtained for approximately $140.

Beyond hydrogen peroxide and acetone, industrial-strength acid was the only remaining ingredient that Zazi needed to manufacture explosives. However, it seems that he had planned to obtain this ingredient after meeting-up with his co-conspirators in Queens. On September 8, just one day before he began the long drive from Denver to New York, he searched the Internet for home improvement merchants located in Flushing, Queens. After locating a store, he scoured its retail webpage for a product that would meet his needs, ultimately settling on "Klean Strip Green Safer Muriatic Acid," a product that was supposed to produce fewer fumes and be safer to handle than conventional acids.[234] Given that this product retails online for about $28 per gallon,[235] it would not have added much to the cost of the operation.

Indeed, the plotters' likely spent far more on everyday items, like transportation costs and lodging, than they did on explosives. For example, Zazi twice rented motel rooms with kitchenettes in order to concentrate the hydrogen peroxide content of the hair supplies by boiling them, and in early September, he spent money on a rental car and gasoline to transport his homemade explosives cross-country from Denver to New York.[236] Since the supplies purchased by Zazi's co-conspirators in New York included only the backpacks the plotters were to use to conceal the bombs, some batteries, an electronic scale, and a few other commonly-available items,[237] the total cost of the operation could have been no higher than a couple of thousand dollars. Given this low cost, it is exceptionally likely that the 2009 attack-team received no financial or logistical assistance from bin Laden's organization. Indeed, Zazi claims to have donated money and computers to al-Qaida during his initial training,[238] suggesting that the recruits supplied al-Qaida with funding, rather than the other way around.

5.5.3 TRAINING

The same is not, however, true of the American plotters' training. Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay knew nothing about the conduct of terrorism prior to their recruitment by al-Qaida. During the course of small arms training, which took place in Waziristan in the fall of 2008, Rauf and the other al-Qaida members convinced the trio of New Yorkers to abandon their initial intentions toward insurgency and to attack the United States at the behest of bin Laden's organization. Once this initial training concluded, Medunjanin returned to New York, while Zazi and Ahmedzay visited with family members in Afghanistan and Pakistan.[239]

The plan was for the two remaining New Yorkers to return to Waziristan for some additional specialized instruction in explosives, but Ahmedzay got cold feet and never made the trip.[240] Zazi lacked his friend's compunction and spent another month in Waziristan under the tutelage of al-Qaida bomb-makers.[241] The nature of this instruction placed him in the same intellectual lineage as the London bombers before him.

However, the path was somewhat convoluted. After training Siddiqui Khan in 2005,[242] Abu Obaidah worked closely with Rashid Rauf, one of the men who recruited Zazi and his friends to attack Manhattan at al-Qaida's behest, in another London-based plot, which sought to use liquid-based explosives to down trans-Atlantic jetliners departing Heathrow. Abu Obaidah then died of a long-lingering hepatitis infection sometime in the spring of 2008,[243] roughly nine months before Zazi's explosives training. However, given the Egyptian bomb-maker's previous association with Rauf and the similarities between Zazi's plot and Siddiqui Khan's attack, it seems exceptionally likely that Rauf transmitted Abu Obaidah's knowledge to Zazi.

Court documents also suggest that Ferid Imam, an Ethiopian-born Canadian citizen,[244] may have played a role in Zazi's bomb-training. Prosecutors filed a superseding indictment in July 2010 that charged Imam with providing material support to terrorism and aiding and abetting Zazi, Medunjanin, and Ahmedzay ~~in~~ receiving military-type training" on behalf of al-Qaida.[245] Given that Imam was in the process of finishing an advanced degree in biochemistry at the University of Manitoba when he and two classmates pulled-up stakes and departed for the Afghan jihad in 2007,[246] he certainly had the knowledge necessary to teach Zazi the basic scientific techniques involved in the manufacture of explosives. However, currently available documents neglect to specify the exact nature of Imam's role in the subway plot.

Regardless of who trained him, it seems clear that Zazi was a poor student. In general, his scholastic aptitude was questionable. Zazi failed to graduate high-school[247] and spent his entire professional career in unskilled jobs, such as selling coffee from a cart in southern Manhattan and driving a shuttle van at the Denver airport,[248] neither of which did anything to hone the chemistry skills necessary to manufacture explosives. His specific mastery of bomb-making techniques was similarly debatable. Although Zazi obtained hands-on experience in bomb-making while Waziristan, and although he possessed a digital copy of the bomb-making manual al-Qaida had used to train him, he sent frantic email messages—all of which apparently went unanswered—to his contacts abroad seeking information on the ~~–c~~orrect mixtures of ingredients to make explosives."[249] Zazi did not know how much combustible organic material, namely flour and butterfat (ghee), to add to the concoction. In short, there were some clear holes in Zazi's training. He was hardly a master bomb-maker and may simply have lacked the intellectual capacity to produce explosives on his own.

5.5.4 SUMMATION

Though Zazi's team was far less flamboyant than Ibrahim's, the two groups had much in common. Both teams seem to have undertaken their own tactical-level planning; both teams seem to have been self-sufficient in terms of finance, and both teams had explicit training ties to al-Qaida. Although Abu Obaidah's death precluded the teams from sharing the same trainer, Rauf's ties to Abu Obaidah and subsequent involvement in Zazi's instruction even place both attacks in the same specific training lineage

Similarly, the same criticisms apply to both the July 21 attack-team and the attack team which Zazi led in 2009. Ibrahim and Zazi both possessed educational backgrounds suggesting their intellectual capabilities were below average, and neither man had an employment history suggesting that they had developed practical skills in chemistry. It seems somewhat surprising that al-Qaida selected them to play crucial roles in the organization's larger strategy against the West. Clearly, al-Qaida had either abandoned or simply chose to ignored the screening questionnaires Atef once used to evaluate the 9/11 hijackers.

[249] Zazi detention memo.

In combination with the organization‘s apparent inability to provide attack-teams with much, if anything, in the way of financial or logistical support, these personnel quality issues have greatly mitigated the scale of the threat posed by hit squads. While it would be premature to dismiss the possibility of a resurgence in al-Qaida‘s capabilities, the quality of the hit squads al-Qaida has deployed to the West have devolved substantially in the decade following 9/11. The security threat that such attack-teams pose today is an order of magnitude smaller than it was at the height of al-Qaida‘s prowess in 2001.

5.6 CONCLUSION

When viewed in tandem with the non-Western cases discussed in the previous chapter, the five events discussed above suggest that al-Qaida was not a successfully adaptive organization between 2001 and 2009. Table 5.1 demonstrates that, at the organizational level, both the extent and nature of al-Qaida‘s involvement in Western hit squad attacks declined over time. Circa 2001, when al-Qaida conducted the 9/11 attacks, the organization tightly controlled virtually every aspect of attacks on the West, but as event progressed through the various attempts on London, bin Laden‘s organization became increasingly more distant from events. By the time that Najibullah Zazi and his associates attempted to bomb the New York City subway in 2009, al-Qaida‘s role was limited to the provision of training and a measure of strategic guidance.

Similar trends were also evident at the individual level. The quality of al-Qaida‘s personnel, their training, their access to logistical resources, and their access to external funding all devolved rather than evolved. Admittedly, the organization‘s many attempts to utilize outsiders and novice jihadists in the years after 2001 suggest that al-Qaida attempted to compensate for the tremendous attention it received from the global security community in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks by consciously shifting from a hierarchical bureaucratic structure to a flatter, less formal structure, but a preponderance of evidence demonstrates that a concomitant decline in the organization‘s ability to recruit, train, and support quality personnel also took place. Indeed, the post-9/11 hit squads made numerous and often egregious mistakes, such as: Sidique Khan‘s poor tactical planning, Hamid, Ahmet, and Omar‘s flamboyant support of radical Islam, Ibrahim‘s inability to perform basic math, and Zazi‘s inability to remember his training, despite owning a copy of al-Qaida‘s bomb-making manual. Consequently, al-Qaida is aptly described as an experimental organization, but the many theorists who extol the group‘s ability to successfully innovate and reorganize greatly overstate the case.

While this conclusion strongly suggests that the probability that al-Qaida will conduct a successful mass-casualty attack is substantially lower than it was a decade ago, this finding applies only to those events in which the organization played a strong functional role. In order to fully evaluate the scale of the threat the organization poses, it is necessary to examine instances in which al-Qaida has acted almost via proxy, by supporting attacks and plots primarily conducted by other organizations. Consequently, the next chapter examines terrorist events to which bin Laden‘s organization has been weakly linked.

6.0 ENTREPRENEURSHIP, EVOLUTION, AND THE FLUCTUATION OF RELATIONSHIPS AMONG TERRORISTS WITH WEAK FUNCTIONAL TIES TO AL-QAIDA

Analysts often discuss al-Qaida's relationships with other terrorist organizations in terms of grand strategy. For example, in 2011, Barak Mendelsohn argued that al-Qaida sought to expand "on a much broader geographic scale" by establishing "a public and permanent presence in the form of [regional] branches carrying the al-Qaeda name."[1] Similarly, Bill Braniff and Assaf Moghadam, of West Point's Combatting Terrorism Center, argued in 2011 that al-Qaida deliberately completed a structural transition into "a multi-polar organization with a central hub in North Waziristan and a small number of autonomous regional nodes."[2]

These authors are correct in suggesting that al-Qaida plans for the future; however, they likely overstate the extent of the organization's control over the nature of its relationships with other terror groups. This chapter, which explores over-time patterns among events that display weak functional ties to al-Qaida, suggests that changes to inter-organizational relationships are exceptionally incremental and reflect gradual evolutionary trends, rather than discrete strategic decisions about the nature and extent of cooperation. As evidence of this pattern, this chapter considers five cases involving al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah: (1) the 2002 Bali bombings, (2) the 2003 bombing of the Jakarta Marriott hotel, (3) the 2004 bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta, (4) the 2005 Bali bombings, and (5) the 2009 near-simultaneous bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and the Ritz-Carlton hotels. When viewed in sequence, these cases demonstrate that al-Qaida held the greatest strategic influence over Southeast Asian terror at the time of the 2002 Bali bombings, but this influence degraded steadily and incrementally over time, as Hambali and other key operatives that bound JI to al-Qaida were lost, and as the influence of Noordin Mohd Top gradually rose, until he became regarded as Southeast Asia's most dangerous terrorist and began operating largely independent of both al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah.[3]

Following this introduction, this chapter contains eight sections. Since this chapter focuses extensively on Noordin, the first section briefly outlines his background and early involvement in terrorism. The second through sixth sections then discuss each of the cases mentioned above in sequence, before the seventh section presents some network measurements that offer additional evidence demonstrating that the charismatic leadership of Noordin and his primary partner, the bomb-making expert Azahari bin Husin, held-together the loose network responsible for conducting the best-known Islamist-motivated terror attacks perpetrated in Indonesia after the 2002 Bali bombings. Finally, the eighth section offers some broad conclusions regarding the nature and extent of al-Qaida's involvement in events displaying weak functional ties to the organization. In order to ensure even comparison, each of the qualitative cases also follow the same internal structure and contain sub-sections discussing the attack's planning, logistics and finance, and training, as well as a brief summation that compares the event to preceding cases.

[3] For the characterization of Noordin as Southeast Asia's most dangerous terrorist, see: Seth Mydans, ―A Terrorist Mastermind Whose Luck Ran Out," New York Times, September 17, 2009.

6.1 BACKGROUND

Noordin's involvement with Islamist terrorism began not with al-Qaida, but with Jemaah Islamiyah. His first affiliation was ideological; while a master's student at Malaysia Technical University in the mid-1990s, Noordin began taking religious classes at Luqmanul Hakiem Pesantren, an Islamic school in Johor, Malaysia, that functioned analogously to more-familiar South Asian madrassas. The school was run by veteran members of JI; for example, Ali Ghufron (a.k.a. Mukhlas), of Bali-bombing infamy, served as the school's headmaster. By 1998, Noordin had become a full-fledged member of JI, and when the organization decided that Luqmanul might draw-in more local students if it were headed by a Malaysian, he took-over Ali Ghufron's directorship, at least in name.[4]

Noordin's formal terror training, little of it that there was, also took place within Jemaah Islamiyah. Unlike many of JI's other high-ranking members, Noordin did not participate in the Soviet-Afghan War, nor train in an al-Qaida camp. Instead, he completed a short, two week course at Camp Hudiabiyah, a JI training facility that was located on the southern Philippine island of Mindanao in territory controlled by the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF), an Islamist insurgent group that had a long-standing cooperative relationship with JI.[5] Given this scant training and his role as Luqmanul's headmaster, it is little surprise that Noordin's initial role in the organization was primarily logistical and ideological in nature.

However, when the Malaysian government cracked-down on extremists following the 9/11 attacks, Noodin's circumstances began to change. He and many other individuals affiliated with Luqmanul were forced to flee to Indonesia. By mid-2002, several of them, including Noordin, were living in Bukittinggi, on the island of Sumatra, where they ran a small repair shop together. The group soon grew to include the bomb-maker Azahari Husin, another Malaysian, who Noordin had first met years earlier when the two had overlapping stints at Malaysia Technical University, where Azahari once taught classes in statistics and housing policy.[6] Operationally speaking, the two men would brush past al-Qaida in the course of the 2002 Bali bombings, before initiating a more direct relationship with bin Laden's organization that briefly spiked in 2003, and then gradually degraded during the course of Noordin's multi-year campaign of terror.

6.2 THE 2002 BALI BOMBINGS: NOORDIN'S FIRST BRUSH WITH AL-QAIDA

Just after 11.00pm, on October 10, 2002, a young Indonesian named Iqbal detonated a backpack filled with explosives inside Paddy's Pub, a nightclub popular with Australian tourists located in Kuta's busy commercial district on the island of Bali, killing himself and a handful of patrons in the process. The survivors immediately fled into the street, where a powerful 1,000kg car-bomb laid waiting hidden inside of a white Mitsubishi van. Dulmatin, an Indonesian graduate of al-Qaida's Afghan camps, used a cell phone to trigger the massive device just a few seconds later, causing the bulk of the coordinated attack's 202 fatalities. At the gates of the U.S. Consulate in Denpassar, located several miles away from the other attack sites, Idris, another Indonesian with experience in Afghanistan, remotely-triggered a third bomb, hidden inside of a backpack that had purportedly been filled with excrement to inflict "moral damage." However, this final explosion injured only a single gate guard and caused some minor property damage.[7]

For a superb journalist summary of the attack, see: Sally Neighbor, In the Shadow of Swords: On the Trail of Terrorism from Afghanistan to Australia, (Sydney, Australia: Harper Collins, 2004).

A number of sources have alleged that al-Qaida played an important role in these bombings. For example, American government sources claim that KSM played an as-yet unspecified part in planning the attack,[8] and media outlets publicized a claim of responsibility that al-Qaida made in the attack's aftermath.[9] However, evidence drawn primarily from first-person accounts of the terrorists involved in the Bali attacks demonstrates that al-Qaida's role in the 2002 Bali bombing was less substantial. Bin Laden's organization played a strategic role, as members of al-Qaida helped to shape JI's grand vision of jihad, and bin Laden likely provided one stream of revenue that supported the attacks, but given that the attackers had two other substantial pools of funding from which to draw, it remains impossible to definitively prove that the dissident Saudi's money directly funded the Bali blast. Al-Qaida did, however, play a demonstrable indirect role, by training several of the operation's key participants years earlier, during the tail-end of the Soviet-Afghan War. Given these ties, this attack was weakly tied to bin Laden's organization according to the strict formal cut-points used in the classification analysis, but was strongly tied to Jemaah Islamiyah.

Noordin's role in the Bali bombings was even less substantial. Like al-Qaida, he helped to shape the grand strategy that motivated the Bali bombings, but his role in their specific planning was negligible, if it existed at all. Similarly, he played no role in the attack's funding, logistics, or operations. As the Bali bombings represented his first demonstrable active involvement in a terrorist event, his initial interaction with al-Qaida was truly fleeting.

6.2.1 PLANNING

The idea of bombing nightclubs that cater to Westerners seems to have originated at a meeting that Hambali held in Bangkok, Thailand, in early 2002. However, the evidence suggests that these early discussions took place primarily at the strategic level. The meeting's participants agreed to focus on ―soft targets," like bars and nightclubs, but had not yet singled-out Bali as their first target, much less selected Paddy's Pub and the Sari Club as specific attack sites. As Noordin took part in these discussions, he helped to set the grand strategy that led to the Bali bombings.[10] Al-Qaida's analogous role stemmed from the attendance and participation of Mohamed Mansour Jabarah,[11] a Kuwaiti-born Canadian citizen who swore bayat to bin Laden in 2001 and held exceptionally close ties to Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.[12]

An additional strategic refinement to the soft-target strategy took place in May, when another meeting was held, this time in Solo, Indonesia, at the home of Dulmatin,[13] a Jemaah Islamiyah member who had been involved in radical Islam since training in al-Qaida's Sada Camp on the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan in the late 1980s.[14] The four-man meeting was headed by Ali Ghufron, who had mentored Noordin at Luqmanul, and was attended by Ali Imron, who was one of Ghufron's younger brothers; Imam Samudra, who alongside Hambali had served as a sort of field commander during JI's 2000 bombing of Christian churches across Indonesia on Christmas Eve; and Dulmatin, the host. Specifically, the men discussed how the Christmas Eve bombings had been poorly received by Indonesia's Muslim community, and decided that the next attack should specifically target —America and its allies."[15] Neither Noordin, nor any al-Qaida men were present and, thus, played no role in this strategic refinement.

This gathering's conclusions were then validated by JI's emir, Abu Bakar Ba'asyir, at a third strategic-level meeting. At Ba'asyir's home in Solo, Indonesia, Ghufron, Imron, and Samudra gathered again, and were joined by Ba'asyir and two other high-ranking members of Jemaah Islamiyah. The Christmas Eve bombings were again criticized as ineffective, and Ba'asyir instructed the men to proceed against Westerners as they had previously decided.[16] While this event irrefutably links JI's highest leader to the attack, it also demonstrates the small, marginal role that Noordin, as an individual, and al-Qaida, as an organization, played in planning JI's largest attack to date, because neither he nor any of bin Laden's representatives were present at this gathering.

Finally, specific planning for the attack began in August, when Ghufron and Samudra met at another JI member's home in Solo. At this meeting, Ali Ghufron suggested Bali as the target, and Samudra agreed. Ghufron then suggested that Samudra should lead the operation on the ground, no doubt because of the experience he had gained by coordinating the Christmas Eve bombings, and Samudra agreed to the arrangement.[17] From this point forward, Samudra took the lead at the tactical level, and would manage issues of materiel and attack site-selection, while Ghufron continued to support the bombing at a more strategic level, and provided Samudra with the resources he needed to accomplish specific tasks. Both men would be involved in staffing decisions about which personnel to involve in the attack.

Toward fulfilling his role as field-commander, Samudra convened a more tactically-oriented meeting later that month in Paleban, Indonesia. While sitting inside the car of Amrozi, another of Ali Ghufron's brothers, Samudra assigned specific tasks to the men present. Amrozi would be the attack's primary logistical procurer; his most important task would be to secure explosives. Idris, another veteran of the Soviet-Afghan War and a graduate of bin Laden-affiliated Afghan training camps,[18] would assist Amrozi and was tasked with taking care of the attacks more mundane logistical needs, like transportation and accommodations in Bali. Dulmatin, the al-Qaida-trained extremist who hosted one of the earlier strategic level meetings, would serve as bomb-maker. The men convened again a few days later in Solo's Klewer market, and reaffirmed these roles. Thus, the primary team responsible for the Bali attack was set by late August 2002, and it included neither Noordin, nor any al-Qaida members.[19]

The four participants in the late-August meetings soon departed for Bali, where the remaining tactical planning for the attack took place. Masykur Abdul Kadir, a Balinese Muslim who served as the team's local fixer, drove Samudra, Amrozi, Idris, and Dulmatin around the island in early September 2002, to scout potential attack-sites. They were joined by two additional men: Ali Imron, who was another of Ali Ghufron's brothers, and Utomo Pamungkas

(a.k.a. Mubarok),[20] who was another veteran of the Christmas Eve Bombings.[21] Following this initial scouting, a more detailed survey of the targets was conducted by Agus Hidayat, a young Indonesian who Samudra brought onto the attack team.[22] With the targets selected, Ali Ghufron arrived in Bali a few days later, and received a _tour' of Paddy's Pub and the Sari Club from Idris.[23] Thus, the specific attack sites had been chosen, scouted, and approved at the strategic level about a month before the attack took place.

Beyond his early role in setting JI's grand strategy, Noordin's only role in this attack's planning was passing and brief; it happened largely by accident. In September, after target-selection had been accomplished, Noordin and Dr. Azahari Hussin, his longtime friend and operational partner, traveled from Bukittinggi and showed-up unannounced and unexpected at Ghufron's home in Solo. Given that Azahari was an experienced bomb-maker, who purportedly helped to build some of the devices used in the 2000 Christmas Eve bombings,[24] Ghufron took advantage of the situation and briefed his unexpected houseguests on the operation. Azahari went-on to assist in the design and construction of the bombs, but Noordin received no specific tasking. It is reasonable to speculate that he offered his advice on the plot, but his role does not seem to have gone any farther.[25]

6.2.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

The money to conduct the 2002 Bali attacks came from three sources: Abu Bakar Ba'asyir, Hambali, and crime. Ba'asyir's contribution was the earliest of the three. During the strategic meeting that took place at his home in Solo, JI's emir handed Ghufron the equivalent of several thousand U.S. dollars, but the funds were split across three currencies: about $6,000 was in U.S. bills; an amount equivalent to approximately 9,700 USD was in Singaporean dollars, and the equivalent of another roughly 4,000 USD was in Malaysian Ringgit.[26] The available information does not stipulate how Ba'asyir obtained the money in the first place, but given his position within the organization, and given that JI taxed its members' incomes at a rate of five percent as a type of membership dues,[27] it is reasonable to speculate that these monies came from the organization's internal revenue stream.

Hambali's contribution was roughly equivalent in size; he provided Ghufron with $25,000 late in the summer of 2002. The source of the funds has never been definitively proven, but Ghufron believed that the money "originated from Afghanistan and might be from Syihk [sic] Usama Bin Laden."[28] Thus, at first blush, it seems that reasonably strong circumstantial evidence suggests that al-Qaida played a role in funding the 2002 Bali bombings.

Finally, a robbery conducted in Banten in on August 22 provided approximately $40,000 of additional funding.[29] Using guns provided by Samudra, Agus Hidayat, who also conducted some surveillance in support of the Bali operation, led a small team in the armed robbery of "Elita Gold Jewelers," a Chinese-owned business that the attackers justified targeting on the [28] Ghufron Interrogation. For information on the timing of Ghufron's payments to Samudra, see: Samudra Interrogation.

[29] Ellis quotes the figure at $60,000, but as he was writing in a Canadian paper, it seems logical to assume his figure was in Canadian currency. grounds that the store's non-Muslim owners were a pollutant that poisoned Indonesia's Islamic culture.[30] Thus, the total funds available for the 2002 Bali attacks seems to have been in the neighborhood of $110,000.

During his later interrogation by police, Ghufron was kind enough to provide a rough list of expenditures incurred during the course of the Bali operation, but his totals do not square with the amount of money that was placed at attack team's disposal. Ghufron's budget included:[31]

- Approximately $3,300 for the purchase of explosives;
- Approximately $5,500 for the purchase of automobiles;
- Approximately $1,700 for the purchase of motor-scooters (a necessity for navigating some sections of Kuta's tourist district that are too crowded for cars to pass easily);
- Approximately $6,600 for housing accommodations and communications equipment; and
- Approximately $6,600 that Ghufron held aside, though it remains unclear if these monies represented a contingency fund, or if he simply skimmed a few thousand dollars for his own use.

As these line items total to only $23,700, they could have been covered by any one of the three revenue streams that purportedly funded the attack. Ghufron claims the remaining money, some $86,000 if the revenue estimates are accurate, went to support the insurgency that Islamists were then fighting against Christians on the island of Ambon, in the eastern portion of the Indonesian archipelago.[32] Thus, while the transfer that likely took place between bin Laden (or his emissaries), Hambali, and Ghufron shows demonstrable financial ties between JI and al-Qaida, the fungible nature of money and the fairly low cost of the Bali operation dictate that it is unclear how much, if any, of al-Qaida's money went toward the 2002 bombing.

[31] The Ghufron Interrogation provided the figures in Indonesian Rupiah; they have been converted at the US-Indonesian exchange rate that prevailed in late summer, 2002.
[32] Ibid.

Nor did al-Qaida play any demonstrable role in the procurement of supplies. Amrozi ultimately took the lead in this regard. He acquired the explosives used in the attack from Silvester Tendean, the somewhat corrupt owner of chemical supply outlet in Surbaya, Indonesia, who filed false invoices to hide the purchase of nitrogen-based fertilizer simply because Amrozi bribed him to do so.[33] Amrozi also acquired the Mitsubishi van that served as the attack's bomb-vehicle, buying it second-hand and then personally modifying it to support the weight of the 1,000kg bomb,[34] before Utomo Pamungkas transported it to Bali via ferry in early October.[35] Other members of the attack team on the ground in Bali purchased motor-scooters and some communications equipment, so it is safe to conclude that all of the requisitioning necessary to complete the Bali bombings took place entirely within Jemaah Islamiyah.

Manpower, the final logistical resource needed to complete the attack, was obtained in two ways. Ali Ghufron recruited most of the key members from within JI's existing infrastructure. As demonstrated by the inclusion of his brothers Ali Imron and Amrozi, as well as the inclusion of his long-time associates Imam Samudra, Idris, and Utomo Pamungkas, Ghufron drew heavily on personal ties to build the attack team.

Samudra completed the recruiting process. In the year prior to the attack, he worked as a teacher in Malimping, Indonesia, and used his position to draw some of his students into jihad. For example, Agus Hidayat, who conducted some surveillance of the Bali targets and led the group responsible for the gold store robbery, and Iqbal, who also participated in the robbery before being selected to serve as the operation's martyr, had both studied under Samudra and had no other apparent ties to JI.[36] Suffice it to say, neither Noordin nor al-Qaida played an apparent role in staffing the Bali operation.

6.2.3 TRAINING

Al-Qaida's operational role in the 2002 Bali bombings was indirect and stems primarily from training. Several members of the attack team trained in Afghanistan in camps linked to bin Laden, but many of these interactions took place a decade or more earlier. For example, although Ghufron and Idris trained in a bin Laden-funded camp, their training began circa 1986, roughly two years before al-Qaida's formal establishment.[37] Dulmatin, Samudra, Utomo Pamunkas, and Imron's training was slightly more recent and was more directly attributable to al-Qaida as an organization, because they studied in Afghan camps at various points between 1989 and 1991.[38] Neither Masykur, who served as the attacker's local connection in Bali; Amrozi, who assumed responsibility for many of the attack's logistical needs; Agus Hidayat, the young disciple of Samudra's who assisted in the surveillance of the attack sites and led the team that robbed the gold store in Banten; nor Iqbal, the operation's martyr, had formal training of any type. Azahari, who assisted Dulmatin in making the explosive devices used in the Bali attacks, offers the closest connection between al-Qaida and the 2002 bombings, because he trained in Afghanistan circa 2000.[39]

6.2.4 SUMMATION

Notwithstanding al-Qaida's claims of responsibility, the 2002 Bali bombings were weakly tied to bin Laden's organization and strongly tied to Jemaah Islamiyah. As demonstrated by Mohammed Mansour Jabarah's participation in Hambali's early strategic meetings, al-Qaida helped to shape the grand strategy that guided the attack, but the organization's lack of demonstrable participation in any subsequent meetings, most especially those that discussed the specifics of the Bali operation, suggests that the real planning for 2002 bombing was conducted within Jemaah Islamiyah. Al-Qaida's financial ties to JI are fairly well established at the organizational level by the $25,000 transfer that passed from bin Laden to Hambali made to Ghufron; however, it is not clear that these funds directly supported the Bali blasts, because the size of the other revenue streams at Ghufron's disposal far exceeded the reported cost of the operation, even if the itemized budget that he provided to investigators far understated the attack's total cost. Training constitutes al-Qaida's most direct role in the attack, but given that many of these interactions were historical and occurred more than a decade prior to the bombing, it is difficult to state that they constitute evidence of al-Qaida's organizational involvement in the same way that near-term training ties do in regards to the hit-squad attacks discussed in the fifth chapter. Put more simply, organizations at some point lose control over the people they that they train. This same logic applies to estimations of al-Qaida's role in the most active portion of the attack, the triggering of the explosive devices. Indeed, the only individual who sacrificed his life in the conduct of the attacks seems to have never left Indonesia.

Noordin's role in the bombing was similarly weak. He also helped to formulate the strategy that guided the attack, but his role in the specific planning was negligible. He played no part in the attack's finance or logistics, and he did not participate in its operational phase. Thus, as it regards the Bali bombings, Noordin's overlap with al-Qaida was exceptionally weak. They participated together only in the vague strategic phase of the attack, but their respective involvements were otherwise confined to different spheres, with Noordin playing an exceptionally minute role in planning, and al-Qaida playing a larger, though somewhat vague, role in the attack's finance and a historical role training several of the Bali operatives. However, this pattern would not repeat the following year, when Noordin led the team that bombed the Jakarta Marriott hotel in August of 2003.

6.3 THE 2003 JAKARTA MARRIOTT BOMBING

On August 5, 2003, Asmar Latin Sani drove a mini-van into the horseshoe-shaped driveway of the Jakarta Marriott, but his vehicle was so laden with explosives that it struggled up the slight incline that separated the hotel's elevated entrance from the street. The van's difficulty was substantial enough to draw the attention of the hotel's security guards, several of whom began to approach the suspicious vehicle. Asmar then panicked and detonated his bomb before the truck was fully in position.[40] A dozen people died in the blast, and another 150 were injured.[41] However, knowledgeable observers speculate that the damage would have been on the scale of the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, which destroyed a federal building, if Asmar had driven alongside the lobby before triggering the explosion.[42]

This event represented Noordin's first strong operational role in a terrorist attack; he effectively functioned as JI's field commander during the bombing. Although Noordin seems to have planned the attack without much assistance from JI's senior leadership, he received their direct operational and logistical support, thereby demonstrating that the broader organization played an incredibly strong role in the attack. Al-Qaida's role was substantially weaker. The organization provided some, but not all, of the attack's funding, and does not seem to have shaped the attack's planning in the same indirect way implied by Jabarah's participation in the first strategy meeting that preceded the 2002 Bali bombings.

6.3.1 PLANNING

Noordin exhibited a fair amount of independence in his attack planning. Without the apparent input of higher-ranking JI leaders, he recruited his own team, drawing heavily on Luqmanul Hakiem's pool of alumni, with whom he was intimately familiar from his time as the school's headmaster. Azahari, whose bomb-making skills had been demonstrated in the Bali attacks, worked alongside Noordin and doubtlessly assisted with the technical details,[43] of which Noordin was likely ignorant as a result of the exceptionally short duration of his formal training. Although some sources hypothesize Hambali's involvement in the Marriott Bombing's planning,[44] JI's larger organization does not seem to have imposed the same level of managerial control as it did in the Bali bombings. A protracted series of grand strategy meetings with the organization's senior leadership did not precede the 2003 attack, which is not entirely surprising as many JI members had been on the run since the Indonesian authorities made the organization a primary target of investigation in the aftermath of Bali. Whatever the reasons, the locus of decision making was far smaller in the 2003 bombing than in the previous year's attack.

Consequently, there was not much division of labor in the detailed tactical planning that took place once the attack team decided to focus its efforts on Jakarta. Team members split-up to examine specific targets. Working alongside Mohamed Ikhwan (a.k.a. Ismail), a Luqmanul alumnus that had been recruited into the plot, Azahari conducted initial surveillance on the hotel and a local Citibank branch. Meanwhile, Noordin and Masrizal bin Ali Umar (a.k.a. Tohir), another Luqmanul alumnus, conducted surveillance on the American International School and the Australian International School. Ultimately, the hotel won-out as the target because Noordin believed it provided the greatest brand recognition, and because it was deemed to have relatively lax security, making it more accessible than the other potential targets.[45]

6.3.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Explosives, the most crucial logistical requirement of any bombing campaign, had already been acquired when Noordin and Azahari began to conceptualize the bombing. Following the 2000 Christmas Eve bombings, JI found itself with a surplus, and placed the excess materials in storage with a member named Toni Togar. However, the investigation that followed the Bali blasts unnerved him, and he was no longer willing to store the explosives. He called Noordin to tell him he was planning to throw them out, so, in a jihadist twist on supply-side economics, the existence of excess explosives caused the demand for a bombing, and Noordin designed the Jakarta operation to prevent the surplus material from going to waste. After receiving the explosives from Togar, who shipped them to an intermediary as unaccompanied luggage on an inter-city bus, Noordin turned his attention towards the requisition of the remaining supplies.[46]

He tasked Asmar and Masrizal to rent a house in Jakarta and to purchase a van for the explosion. Both were easily accomplished, and at moderate cost. They acquired the van, a

[46] Ibid.

Toyota Kijang, second-hand from a local business man, for a cost of approximately $3,000.[47] Information on the cost of accommodations has been lost to history, but if the expenses Ghufron incurred during the Bali operation are representative, then Noordin's team would have been able to acquire space to live and work for around $6,600. Given the _free' explosives, this places the total cost of the attack just below $10,000.

Money to support these expenses came from many of the same sources as they had in the 2002 Bali bombings. In a turn of events reminiscent of the gold store robbery, Noordin's immediate team provided a substantial share of the money for the attack through crime. In May 2003, Toni Togar, who was apparently less worried about being arrested for armed robbery than for possession of explosives, held-up a bank in Medan, and the ill-gotten funds went toward the bombing's expenses, though the size of Togar's haul remains unclear.[48]

However, the plot's finances also involved the larger networks of both al-Qaida and JI. Ali al-Azia Ali (a.k.a. Ammar al-Baluchi), who also handled cash disbursements and logistical issues for the 9/11 attacks at the direction of his uncle KSM, provided the Marriott bombers with approximately 50,000 USD. The transfer occurred through a convoluted series of cut-outs. Hambali dispatched his younger brother, Rusman Gun-Gun Gunawan, then a religious student in Pakistan, to collect the funds from Ali and deliver them to Bangkok. Mohammed Nazir bin Lep (a.k.a. Lillie), who traveled with Gun-Gun to Thailand, facilitated contact with another man, Mohd Farik bin Amin (a.k.a. Zubair), who had been slated to participate as a suicide attacker in the aborted follow-on plot to the 9/11 attacks that would have targeted buildings on America's west coast.[49] From Zubair, the money eventually found its way to Mohamed Ikhwan (a.k.a. Ismail), the same Luqmanul alumnus who participated in surveillance in support of the attack. He picked-up the cash, now wrapped in paper bundles, from an un-named man in nearby Dumai, Indonesia.[50] Although circuitous, the money's path shows that Noordin's budding autonomy was still limited at the time of the 2003 Marriott Bombings; he was operationally independent, but his funding network involved members of al-Qaida's core, stand-alone members of JI, and Hambali, who held simultaneous membership in both organizations.[51]

6.3.3 TRAINING

Beyond Azahari's experience in the Afghan camps and Noordin's short training course in the southern Philippines, little information has emerged regarding how and where the members of the 2003 bombing team learned their trade as terrorists. Masrizal, who helped procure the Toyota van and the team's safe house, spent a year at Camp Hudiabiyah between 1998 and 1999.[52] Although the radical beliefs of Asmar, the operation's martyr, and Toni Togar, who provided the explosives and helped to finance the attack through crime, can be traced to the years the men spent al-Mukim Islamic Boarding School, a pesantren run by Ba'asyir,[53] nothing is known about their training history. However, since suicide-driving and armed robbery are not particularly specialized skillsets, the men simply may not have required any specialized instruction in order to contribute to jihad.

6.3.4 SUMMATION

As was the case with the 2002 Bali bombings, the 2003 Jakarta Marriott attack was strongly connected to Jemaah Islamiyah and weakly tied to al-Qaida. Unlike the Bali bombings, this attack was strongly tied to Noordin, who, in turn, remained strongly tied to JI. Although Noordin displayed a fair amount of independence in the planning and recruitment phase of the operation, he still staffed his operation with individuals with long-standing ties to the organization, as demonstrated by his reliance on the alumni of Luqmanul and al-Mukim. Moreover, a past JI attack, specifically the 2000 Christmas Eve bombings, filled the long pole in Noordin‘s logistical tent by giving him immediate, cost-free access to the most crucial resource necessary to conduct a bombing.

The plots‘ finances were, however, more of a blend between self-reliance and organizational support. Noordin benefitted directly from Toni Togar‘s exploits in armed robbery, as well as from money that can be traced directly back to al-Qaida through a circuitous chain of intermediaries involving members of both JI and bin Laden‘s organization. The little information that exists regarding the attack team‘s training history suggests that al-Qaida‘s role was largely absent, except of course in regards to the bomb-maker Azahari. But given that bomb-making is the key skillset necessary to complete attacks like the Marriott bombing, this role should not be entirely dismissed. However, it is also remains unknown how much of the expertise that Azahari brought to bear in the 2003 attack stemmed from his time in Afghanistan, and how much of it resulted from practical experienced gained during previous attacks. In the end, it seems fair state that al-Qaida was not crucially involved in the training of the 2003 bombing‘s operatives.

As regards Noordin's interactions with al-Qaida, they were of a qualitatively different type than in the 2002 bombing. Rather than ships passing in the night, Noordin and al-Qaida were now moored in the same harbor. He benefitted directly from monies provided by the same paymaster who wired funds to the 9/11 hijackers, placing Noordin in reasonably close financial proximity to the core of bin Laden's organization. However, the Malaysian mastermind was otherwise independent of al-Qaida. Thus, the overall extent of Noordin's relationship with al-Qaida remained weak, but was far closer to the cut-point between weak and strong than had been the case a year earlier in 2002. However, as the following discussion of the 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta will show, this pattern was just as ephemeral as the one that characterized Noordin's organizational affiliations at the time of the 2002 Bali bombings. Noordin's evolution was beginning to take a decidedly entrepreneurial path.

6.4 THE 2004 BOMBING OF THE AUSTRALIAN EMBASSY IN JAKARTA

The 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta unfolded in almost identical fashion to the previous year's attack on the Marriott hotel. On September 9, 2004, Heri Golun, a young man with no previous experience in jihad, drove up to the fortress-like building's gates in a van and detonated the powerful explosive device hidden within. No one inside the building was hurt, but nine people on the street died in the blast, most of them locally-hired security guards. An additional 150 people were injured, and the property damage was massive. The nearby Greek and Chinese embassies were partially gutted, and office buildings several blocks away suffered broken windows.[54]

[54] "Target Australia: Jakarta bomb kills 11," Sydney Morning Herald, September 9, 2004; Paul Dillon, "Blast rocks Jakarta near Australian Embassy," USA Today, September 8, 2004; Simon Jeffery and Mark Oliver, "Australian embassy bomb kills nine," The Guardian (London), September 9, 2004.

Despite the operational similarities between the embassy bombing and the previous year's attack, the 2004 bombing represented a devolution in Noordin's relationship with al-Qaida and Jemaah Islamiyah. His relationships with both organizations waned. Al-Qaida's financial ties to this attack are far less clear, and Noordin's operational team contained a number of individuals with no previous connections to JI. Indeed, he drew team members and resources from a diverse collection of formal organizations, and also included a number of rookie jihadists, who had no previous experience in terrorism. However, it would also be a mistake to state that Noordin had complete operational independence from JI at the time of the embassy bombing. He continued to rely on the organization for some of his logistical needs and also to indoctrinate the individuals selected to serve as suicide-bombers. Therefore, 2004 was a period of transition, during which Noordin would make strides toward independence, while remaining strongly tied to JI.

6.4.1 PLANNING

In planning this attack, Noordin relied on experienced jihadists to fill several key roles. His stalwart companion Azahari Husin continued to serve as chief bomb-maker and assisted in the technical aspects of planning. Similarly, Agus Hidayat, the Samudra disciple who conducted surveillance in support of the 2002 Bali bombings and led the team responsible for the gold-store robbery, was tasked with procuring explosives.[55] However, Noordin also began to look beyond the ranks of JI. Usman bin Sef (a.k.a. Fahim), an Afghan veteran and a JI leader in Eastern Java, and Iwan Dharmawan (a.k.a. Rois), an Islamist with no previous involvement with JI, assumed the job of recruiting. Working through personal relationships, they placed Noordin in contact with a pool of new recruits who existed entirely outside of JI. The widespread use of these green recruits in the embassy bombing would constitute a substantial strategic change from the previous year's attack on the Marriott.

Surprisingly, Noordin seems to have delegated much of the tactical level planning. Rois was tasked with conducting surveillance on the embassy—it remains unclear whether or not the team ever even considered any other targets—and Azahari was in charge of planning the team's escape route.[56] Thus, Noordin led at a strategic level, rather than micro-managing every aspect of the attack.

6.4.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

In contrast to the 2003 hotel attack, which Noordin easily staffed with long-time friends and associates, manpower presented a substantial logistical hurdle in the 2004 embassy bombing. Noordin overcame this challenge and gained access to a new pool of recruits via two intermediaries. The first was Iwan.

Noordin met Iwan through Bagus Budi Pranoto (a.k.a. Urwa or Urwah), a veteran JI member whose involvement with the organization dates to at least 1998, when he took part in planning meeting alongside JI luminaries like Utomo Pamungkas, Ali Imron, and quite likely Noordin.[57] During the course of a conversation with Noordin about the need to find more fighters committed to jihad, Bagus suggested that a friend of his, Iwan Dharmawan, might be able to help.

Noordin was immediately enamored of Iwan's Islamist pedigree. Iwan held vague connections to Darul Islam, the Islamist insurgency that had spawned JI in the early 1990s. He was also an alumnus of jihadist training camps based in the Southern Philippines, and, like his friend Bagus, Iwan was an alumnus of Universitas an-Nur, an Islamic college of sorts favored by many Indonesian extremists. After being welcomed into Noordin's budding organization, Iwan became an important recruiter in his own right, by tapping into his own friendship and family networks. He drew Kang Jaya, his uncle by marriage and an experienced Darul Islam member, into the plot, as well as another former student of Universita an-Nur.[58]

However, Noordin's manpower issues were not entirely resolved by Iwan's contributions. To obtain new recruits, he also relied on a second intermediary, Usman (a.k.a Fahim). He drew recruits into Noordin's network in much the same manner as Iwan had, by using personal connections. The primary difference in their two patterns is that Usman seems to have at least partially relied on deception.

Specifically, he contacted a friend and former Afghan alum to inquire if his son would be interested in learning to program computer viruses that would wreak havoc on the United States. Although the son, Heri Golun, stated that he would prefer to fight in the conflict simmering between Christians and Muslims in Indonesia's Sulawesi province, he reluctantly agreed. However, when he turned up, he and another young man, presumably recruited under similar pretenses, were introduced to Noordin and Azahari, who soon began to groom Heri to become the suicide-driver in the embassy bombing.[59]

Thus, Iwan and Usman solved Noordin's manpower issues, and the attack team was an amalgam that contained Noordin's long-time supporters and new recruits drawn from Iwan and Usman's personal networks. Indeed, 10 of the 15 men (66.7 percent) who held direct operational or financial links to the 2004 attacks were rookies in their first year of demonstrable active involvement in violent jihad. For point of comparison, consider the 2003 Marriott attacks, which were conducted by a team that included 23.1 percent rookies—less than one-third the rate of the Australian embassy bombing team.

Moreover, the 2004 team was not just inexperienced, they were also exceptionally young. The differences between the suicide bomber involved in the 2003 and 2004 attacks are illustrative. Noordin selected Asmar Latin Sani to serve as the _martyr' in the Marriott bombings. At 28 years of age and as a 1995 graduate of Ba'asyir's pesantren, Asmar was well-steeped in Islamist theology and had long association with JI.[60] Heri Golun, who Noordin selected to die in the attack on the Australian embassy, lacked comparable credentials. The evidence suggests that he was barely out of high-school when he died.[61]

Ultimately, the composition of Noordin's 2004 attack-team strongly suggests that he had drifted even farther from the control of JI's central leadership, a pattern no doubt amplified by the fact that Hambali, who had funneled JI's organizational resources to Noordin in the previous year's attack, had been arrested in Thailand in August 2003, less than a week after the execution of the Marriott bombing, as the result of an independent line of investigation that tracked Hambali's efforts to implement attacks in Phnom Penh and Bangkok, rather than as a direct result of his support for Noordin.[62]

Beyond manpower, explosives were the other logistical resource most vital to the attack. Noordin's team seems to have cobbled together a large quantity from several smaller sources. Usman also helped with this aspect of the attack. He funneled 25 kilograms of potassium chlorate, 10 kilograms of sulfur, and 30 kilograms of TNT to Noordin shortly after introducing him to Heri. Members of the insurgent group KOMPAK, which fought against Christians in Sulawesi, provided additional supplies.

These logistical ties ran through a militant known only as Usman the Mouse. He visited Surabaya in April 2004 in connection with a commercial trading company that he ran, and was introduced to Noordin by a mutual friend. Unable to fill his need for explosives from existing sources, Noordin asked the Mouse if he would be willing to serve as his intermediary to KOMPAK's leadership. The Mouse agreed, and KOMPAK soon began to funnel supplies to Noordin. At a minimum, the Malaysian militant received 10 kilograms of TNT and a supply of detonation cord from the Mouse, before Noordin's relationship with KOMPAK soured, amid concerns from that organization's leadership that Noordin was usurping their authority.[63]

Beyond explosives, information is sparse regarding the acquisition of the other supplies that Noordin's team required to complete the 2004 bombing. However, as the previous discussions of the 2002 Bali bombings and the 2003 Marriott bombing showed, safe houses, automobiles, and communications equipment were readily and cheaply available. There is no reason to assume that Noordin's team experienced any great difficulty acquiring such resources in advance of the embassy bombing.

The sources of money that Noordin used to pay for this attack remain somewhat of a mystery. It is possible that he was able to carry-over some leftover funds from the 2003 attack, but given that Noordin asked his friends in KOMPAK to find some young men willing to commit robbery in support of jihad shortly before his relationship with the organization went bad,[64] it seems likely that Noordin's coffers were low.

[64] Ibid.

Iwan posited another source of funds: al-Qaida. Following his arrest, he told police that Azahari received bundles of Australian dollars via courier. When Iwan inquired about their source, he was told that they came from bin Laden.[65]

The provenance of this information is, however, debatable. Iwan knew only what Azahari told him, so there is no assurance that this information was the truth. Moreover, the methods that the Indonesian police used to extract the information likely included physical punishment, so it is quite possible that Iwan simply told them what they wanted to hear in order to stop the pain. Thus, the source of the money behind the embassy bombing remains ambiguous, but if Iwan's claim proves true, it would require a re-evaluation of Noordin's entire relationship with al-Qaida, because this information would demonstrate that the arrest of Hambali, who served as the primary link between Noordin's network and bin Laden's organization, did not sever Noordin's financial ties to al-Qaida.

6.4.3 TRAINING

Rather than JI or al-Qaida, Noordin's untested recruits received in-house training from other participants in the plot. Some of this was fairly formal in nature. For example, Iwan and his uncle, Kang Jaya, operated a short-lived training camp at Cisolok, Indonesia, where some members of the team received instruction that echoed Iwan and Kang's own earlier experiences in the southern Philippines.[66] Similarly, Azahari instructed Heri, the operation's martyr, in a month-long bomb-making course, before he and two other potential suicide-bombers spent several weeks being ideologically 'ripened' at a pesantren located in Cikampek by Baharudin Soleh (a.k.a. Abdul Hadi), an old friend of Noordin's and a graduate of Ba'asyir's religious school.[67] However, Noordin and Azahari also had a direct role in this ripening process; in the days immediately preceding the attack, Heri moved-in with the duo and even slept in the same room as Azahari and Noordin, so that he could receive last-minute religious instruction.[68] Finally, Iwan also conducted some vital last minute training; he taught Heri to drive in the days just before the attack. Otherwise, the operation's martyr would have been unable to deliver the bomb to the gate of the embassy—an anecdote that says a great deal about the general naivety that characterized many members of Noordin's 2004 team.

[65] "Bin Laden 'funded' Australian embassy bombing," Sydney Morning Herald, August 1, 2005.

Thus, in 2004, the training infrastructure on which Noordin drew was, like his network itself, a blend of old and new. Noordin's team still had historical training ties to al-Qaida via Azahari's time in Afghanistan, as well as historical ties to the camps JI had run in the southern Philippines in the late 1990s. However, the green recruits received a mix of ideological instruction from individuals with long-standing ties to JI and some in-house training, much of it conducted under the instruction of Iwan and Kang, who never considered themselves members of JI. Although Noordin's training apparatus was becoming increasingly distinct from JI's, he remained partially reliant on the organization's existing infrastructure.

6.4.4 SUMMATION

Ultimately, 2004 seems to have been a period of transition for Noordin's network. It had lost an important conduit to al-Qaida with the arrest of Hambali, but the ultimate impact of his absence is difficult to judge in light of the claims of bin Laden-linked funding that Iwan made after his arrest. Absent additional evidence to support these assertions, it therefore seems that both the embassy bombing, as an event, and the attack team surrounding Noordin, as an organization, had weak ties to al-Qaida.

[67] ~~–~~Noordin's Networks," p. 10.
[68] Ibid.

Noordin was still strongly tied to JI in 2004; he relied on members of the organization to indoctrinate his suicide bombers and to provide some of the explosives used in the attack. Yet, at the same time, Noordin's planning seems to have taken place entirely outside of JI's larger command structure, and he was increasingly reliant on individuals who lacked previous association with JI, including members of KOMPAK, members of Darul Islam, and several individuals with no previous experience in jihad. At the time of the 2004 attack on the Australian embassy in Jakarta, Noordin's network was not yet fully independent, but the group seems to have had one foot out of JI's door. This budding autonomy would increase moderately by the following year, when Noordin conducted his next major attack, the 2005 Bali bombings, and first adopted a new organizational moniker, Tanzim Qoidatul Jihad (TQJ).

6.5 THE 2005 BALI BOMBINGS

On the evening of October 1, 2005, three suicide-bombers, Aip Hidayat, Misno, and Salik Firdaus, walked into cafes on the island of Bali during the busy dinner rush and detonated explosive hidden inside backpacks, killing themselves and two dozen victims. One of the targets, Raja Bar and Grill, sat in Kuta, on the edge of the same busy tourist district where Paddy's Pub and the Sari Club had been located. The other bomb-site was Jimbarong beach, near the Four Seasons Hotel and the southwestern tip of Bali, where tourists liked to gather at the waterside warang, a sort of open-air food court popular throughout Indonesia, to eat and watch the sunset.[69]

[69] Much of the contextual information is based on a site visit to Bali. For the names of the attackers, see: Noordin's Networks. For a description of the damage and casualties, see: "Bali bomb attacks claim 26 lives," BBC News, October 2, 2005; "Bali bombs were suicide attacks," BBC News, October 2, 2005; Raymond Bonner and Jane Perlez, "Bali Bombings Kill at Least 25 in Tourist Spots," New York Times, October 2, 2005.

Noordin would later claim responsibility for the attack, stating in the process that he was the head of a new organization, Tanzim Qoidatul Jihad for the Malay Island Group.[70] Given that similar phraseology appears in the Arabic-language names of al-Qaida in Iraq and al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula,[71] and given that Noordin concurrently adopted the pseudonym –Aiman" in homage to Ayman al-Zawahiri,[72] the Malaysian jihadist was making powerful claims about the extent of his international connections. Simply put, Noordin claimed to head al-Qaida's Southeast Asian branch. While the evidence demonstrates that Noordin was largely independent of JI by the time of the 2005 Bali bombings, it seems that he exaggerated his connections to al-Qaida. Ultimately, Noordin's connections to bin Laden's organization had become primarily ideological by the time of the second Bali bombings, while his ties to JI remained vaguely operational in nature, but were now largely historical.

6.5.1 PLANNING

The planning patterns of the 2005 attack differed little from those of the previous year. Noordin and Azahari filled their familiar roles and again initiated the attack without obtaining permission from JI's titular leaders. However, Noordin could no longer rely on Iwan or Usman (Fahim) to serve as recruiters and logisticians, because the men had been arrested in separate incidents the previous year.[73]

[73] Usman's arrest actually predated the Australian embassy bombing, but does not seem to have affected the pace of operations. Subur Sugiarto, who had been involved in JI activities in central Java since at least 2003, would partially fill their roles. He served as both a logistical procurer, who helped Noordin to obtain money and materiel through crime, and a recruiter, who used personal ties to draw a number of individuals with no previous jihadist experience in into the attack team.[74] Mohammad Cholily, a JI member who had been active in the organization since the late 1990s, but who remained unknown to Azahari and Noordin until May 2005, also assisted in the logistics, by obtaining explosives.[75] Thus, as it had been during the embassy bombing, Noordin's attack team was a mix of established JI members who had grown dissatisfied with the organization's perceived lack of action and novice jihadists who had no previous experience.

In terms of planning, the most obvious difference between the second Bali bombings and Noordin's previous attacks occurred at the tactical level. While Noordin's 2003 and 2004 attacks used large vehicle-born explosive devices, the 2005 bombing used man-portable explosive devices. One of the more interesting possibilities is that this change represented a deliberate shift in tactics, made because the 2003 and 2004 bombings expended significant quantities of resources, but failed to achieve significant casualties.

However, the reasons behind this tactical shift, as well as many of the 2005 attacks' other tactical details, are likely to remain unknown, since those in the best position to provide information all died before they could be taken into custody. For example, the Bali suicide-bombers perished during the course of the operation. Azahari died alongside two of his bomb-making students in a November 2005 confrontation with Indonesian police,[76] and in September 2009, Noordin died in a gun battle in Solo, Indonesia, alongside five of his remaining disciples, including Bagus Budi Pranoto, the associate who introduced Noordin to the key recruiter in the 2004 embassy bombings.[77]

The organizational structure that Noordin employed has rendered the accounts of the remaining team members virtually useless. According to Mohammad Cholily, who has been in police custody since November 2005, Noordin practiced strict segregation between different portions of the attack team. Although Cholily interacted closely with Azahari, effectively serving as the master bomb-maker's apprentice, he never even met the three martyrs. Azahari repeatedly told the inquisitive Cholily that he had no need to know anything about them, since the suicide-bombers did not affect his portion of the mission.[78] Given this strict adherence to ~~"n~~need to know" practices and the deaths of the team's remaining key members, it seems that substantial ambiguity will continue to surround many of the particulars of the attack's planning.

6.5.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

With the 2004 arrests of team members Usman and Iwan, to say nothing of Heri's death by suicide in the embassy attack, Noordin faced many of the same manpower issues in the second Bali attack that he had in the previous year. He solved them in similar fashion, by relying on an intermediary to recruit on his behalf using personal connections. Specifically, Subur Sugiarto brought several friends with no previous experience in jihad into the group, and a large percentage of the 2005 team was consequently comprised of rookie jihadists.[79] Though the levels were not quite as high as they had been on the embassy-bombing team, a total of five of the nine individuals with direct links to the 2005 attacks (55.6 percent of the team) were rookie jihadists in their first year of demonstrable active involvement in terrorism.

[79] ~~"N~~Noordin's Networks."

Beyond satisfying his need for manpower, the rookies met Noordin's logistical needs in another way; they helped him to obtain vital communications gear by robbing a mobile phone shop.[80] Although it is unclear whether or not the robbery also garnered any cash for Noordin's network, it is reasonable to speculate that the team resold some of the stolen electronics in order to generate partial funding for the 2005 Bali bombings, especially considering that the record has remained mute regarding other financial transactions that may have supported the attack. If Noordin received any support from abroad or any direct transfers from JI's leadership, they have remained hidden. At the very least, he was, as had long been, partially financially independent.

The record has also been largely silent on the subject of the attack's remaining key resource: explosives. Open-source accounts of the attack stipulate that Mohamed Cholily provided the explosives, but they provide no additional information on where he obtained the materials or from whom.[81] Given Noordin's falling-out with KOMPAK and the arrest of Usman (Fahim), it seems unlikely that the 2005 attack-team relied on the same suppliers as the embassy-bombing team had, unless of course the explosive devices used in the second Bali attack were fashioned from surplus materials. It is perhaps telling that the explosive power of the bombs used in this attack were an order of magnitude smaller than the van-bombs used in the 2004 embassy bombing and the 2003 Marriott bombing, but as discussed in regards to planning, the decision to use smaller man-portable devices could also just as easily have been dictated by tactics as by the availability of materials. Additional research into the source and quantity of explosives at the 2005 attack team's disposal would be incredibly valuable, as it would clarify the otherwise ambiguous nature of Noordin's operational relationship with JI and other organizations at the time of the second Bali bombing.

[80] Ibid.
[81] "Militants jailed for role in 2005 Bali bombings."

6.5.3 TRAINING

While much about the logistics and finance of the 2005 attack remain unknown, Noordin's involvement in training is clear. Instead of relying on a third party to train his cadets, as he had in the previous year's embassy attacks, Noordin played a hands-on role with Subir's friends. Working in the cramped space above the Selera Restaurant in Semarang, Noordin taught four recruits to become suicide bombers. Three of them would martyr themselves in the second Bali bombings, but the fourth man, Anif Solchanudin, was denied this _honor,' because he was a veteran of the sectarian conflict in Ambon between Christians and Muslims. Noordin felt Anif's expertise could be better used by training other recruits. So long as Noordin continued to favor suicide attacks, he would apparently always be in need of new recruits, because he seemed to see them as the most expendable martyrs.[82]

Similarly, Azahari continued to provide the network with in-house training in bomb-making. Cholily served as his apprentice during the run-up to the bombings, but he was not Azahari's only student. Gempur Budi Angkoro (a.k.a. Jabir), who was first-cousin to JI luminary Fathur Rahman al-Ghozi,[83] also trained under Azahari during this period, but received few chances to implement his craft. He was killed in a police raid in early 2006, after which investigators found in Gempur's rented home a bomb similar to the explosive devices used in the second Bali bombing, strongly suggesting that the preparations for the 2005 attack served to provide him with hands-on training, as well as suggesting that Gempur's death may have interrupted an additional plot by Noordin's network.[84] Fortunately, Gempur's death, Cholily's arrest, and the death of the two apprentices who perished alongside Azahari in November 2005 seem to have largely extinguished Azahari's training legacy.

6.5.4 SUMMATION

When viewed in total, the evidence suggests that although there was likely some overlap with JI in 2005, nearly all of the conditions for Noordin's independence were set by this time. His newly named organization, TQJ, was not reliant on the larger JI network for bomb-making expertise and preferred instead to rely on Azahari Husin, Noordin's friend and confidant of many years. Because Noordin was willing to work with novice jihadists and in fact seemed to prefer to use them as suicide-operatives rather than _wasting' seasoned veterans, TQJ required few durable members.

Nor was the new organization dependent on JI's larger training structure, or, for that matter, al-Qaida's training resources. Instead, Noordin ran independent camps. As required by the situation, he and Azahari were willing to work with members of organizations other than JI, or to assume a hands-on role.

Finally, TQJ does not seem to have relied on JI's larger structure or al-Qaida _donations' to provide funding. TQJ's repeated involvement in robberies demonstrates that it was willing to steal the cash and sometimes also the equipment needed to conduct operations. However, it is difficult to be especially firm in this conclusion because of the tremendous ambiguity that surrounds so many aspects of the second Bali bombings.

Ultimately, in 2005, a complex web of personal connections, ideological affiliations, and past functional ties still existed between members of Noordin's network and other jihadist terror groups, but it seems that by this time TQJ was likely an independent organization, rather than an al-Qaida cell or a branch of Jemaah Islamiyah. Although the personnel losses that TQJ suffered in the immediate aftermath of the 2005 attack greatly affected the organization's capabilities, its independence remained largely unchanged by the time of its next and final attack, the near-simultaneous bombings of Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels in Jakarta in 2009.

6.6 THE 2009 BOMBING OF THE JAKARTA MARRIOTT AND RITZ-CARLTON HOTELS

On the morning of July 17, 2009, a pair of suicide-bombers attacked two western-owned luxury hotels in Jakarta: the J.W. Marriott, which had also been the target of Noordin's 2003 van-bombing, and the Ritz-Carlton, located less than two-hundred yards away. As they had in the second Bali bombings, the terrorists relied on man-portable explosive devices, rather than vehicle-bombs, and both attackers targeted areas where guests were most likely to congregate. Specifically, the Marriott bomb was detonated in the hotel's second-floor restaurant, where westerners were known to frequently hold breakfast meetings, and the Ritz bomb was detonated in the hotel's main lobby. The explosions were nearly simultaneous, occurring just a few minutes apart, but killed only nine people and injured just a few dozen more.[85]

Broadly speaking, this attack repeated many of the patterns established in 2005. The weapons used were virtually identical. Noordin's organization remained largely independent in terms of planning and training, but likely received some logistical assistance from JI. Moreover, the 2009 team continued to rely heavily on novice jihadists, and demonstrated no clear functional ties to al-Qaida. However, owing to the organizational losses that TQJ suffered in the immediate aftermath of the 2005 bombings, there was little continuity between the 2009 hotel attack and the second Bali bombing in terms of specific personnel.

6.6.1 PLANNING

In terms of planning, the 2009 attack represents an evolution of the second Bali bombing. Noordin again played the part of grand strategist and delegated a number of important tasks to other members of the team. A man known only as Ibrohim played a particularly important role.

He effectively functioned as TQJ's ―inside man" and conducted the bulk of the reconnaissance necessary to plan the operation. Four years earlier, in 2005, Ibrohim had left a higher-paid position to take a job working in the flower shop located in the Ritz-Carlton's lobby.[86] Because the Marriott apparently contracted with this florist, Ibrohim's vantage point allowed him to conduct long-term surveillance on both hotels.[87] Consequently, he seems to have taken the lead on planning many of the attack's tactical details, with Noordin acting in more of an advisory capacity.

The attack's technical details were the responsibility of TQJ's new bomb-maker, Eko Joko Sarjono. The evidence suggests that he was drawn into the network via personal connections to one of Noordin's long-time supporters. Specifically, Eko was a high-school friend of Air Setyawan, who police had briefly arrested ahead of the 2004 embassy bombings on strong suspicion of ties to Noordin's organization, but were forced to release a few months later, when the tight-lipped suspect refused to divulge any details that could be used as evidence of his participation in jihad. Moreover, events that took place in the aftermath of the attack suggest that Air and Eko shared a particularly close bond. Not only were the men friends since high-school and partners on the 2009 Marriott/Ritz-Carlton attack; the pair's operational relationship continued after the hotel bombing. They actually died in the same police encounter, which took place on August 8, when officers raided the house Air and Eko were using as a bomb-factory in an affluent Jakarta suburb.

Nor was Noordin actively involved in recruiting for the 2009 bombings. Because Indonesian jihadists then regarded him as an ~~a~~ll-star," Noordin's prestige certainly granted him an indirect role in recruiting, as would-be jihadists must have jumped at the opportunity to work alongside a luminary figure, but Ibrohim used personal connections to find the team's primary recruiter. His brother-in-law, an Islamic cleric named Syaifudin Jaelani, played the largest role in securing manpower for the operation; he used his position of authority and influence to recruit naïve young men with no previous experience in jihad to serve as suicide-bombers.[88]

At a tactical level, the 2009 attack represented a slight planning refinement to the second Bali bombing. Both attacks relied on suicide-bombers carrying backpack-bombs to simultaneously target multiple attack-sites, but in the 2009 bombings, Noordin's team tried to increase the death toll by adding an additional component. Specifically, the attackers wired a timed device, hidden in a room on one of the Marriott's upper floors, to detonate a few minutes ahead of the planned suicide attacks, on the logic that the hotel's guests, and possibly also those at the nearby Ritz, would empty into the lobby after the initial explosion, thereby placing more potential victims in proximity to the suicide-attackers. However, the plan failed and the attack's death-toll was low, because the timed device never went-off.[89]

6.6.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

In the 2009 bombings, manpower was again a crucial logistical need, which Syaifudin met by perverting his role as an Islamic cleric. From his congregation, he drew the two young men that would go-on to serve as martyrs in the hotel bombings: 18 year-old Dani Dwi Pertama, and 28 year-old Nana Ikhwan Maulana. After grooming them ideologically, Syaifudin then introduced the young men to his brother-in-law, Ibrohim.[90]

As a result of these recruitment patterns, the 2009 bombings, like TQJ's previous two attacks, relied heavily on novice jihadists. Of the 14 individuals who had direct operational or financial ties to the attacks, 9 men (64.3 percent) were rookies with no previous demonstrable involvement in violent extremism. Moreover, at least one of the 2009 bombers seems to have been incredibly naïve. One official involved in the investigation of the hotel attacks claimed that mess left behind in the bathroom of the Marriott hotel room used to stage the attacks' final preparations made it clear that Dani, the young suicide bomber who targeted the Marriott, was so unsophisticated that he did not understand how to use the room's Western-style toilet.[91]

Beyond manpower, the record has remained silent on many of the logistical details of the attack. For example, there is scant information on the source of the explosives. Because police later discovered a large cache of materials in the back yard of Noordin's father-in-law, Baharudin Latif (a.k.a. Baridin),[92] it is reasonable to suspect that Noordin used family connections to secure explosives. However, there is no information on how or where Baharudin obtained the materials, but given that he held independent connections dating to the late 1990s to Bagus Budi Pranoto, who played an important role in the 2004 embassy bombing,[93] it is reasonable to speculate that Baharudin's stash was a surplus left-over from the 2004 attack.

Regardless of the ultimate source of Noordin's explosives, many of the 2009 operation's more mundane logistical needs were met by Amir Ibrahim (a.k.a. Amir Abdillah). For example, he rented the Marriott hotel room used to stage the final preparations for the attack—the same room where police would later find the time-bomb that failed to explode. Though this contribution suggests a fairly small role in the attack, he was a full member of the attack team and held substantial knowledge about his co-conspirators. For example, the August 8 showdown that resulted in Air and Eko's deaths followed Amir's arrest by only three days, strongly suggesting that he provided the intelligence that led police to his compatriots' door.[94]

Funding for the attack seems to have come from abroad and flowed through a convoluted set of overlapping relationships. Specifically, Saefudin Zuhri, who was distantly related to Noordin through marriage—the two men apparently wed first cousins[95]—arranged a meeting between the infamous terrorist and Muhamad Jibril Abdurahman (a.k.a. Muhamad Ricky Ardan bin Mohammad Iqbal), an Indonesian with long-standing, multi-faceted ties to terrorism. Abdurahman was the son of Muhammad Iqbal,[96] a radical preacher whose influence radicalized prominent JI members including Hambali and Yazid Sufaat.[97] Moreover, Abdurahman had spent time in Pakistan alongside Hambali's younger brother, Rusman Gun Gun Gunawan, and once held financial ties to Imam Samudra, the field commander of the first Bali bombings.[98] However, it remains unclear whether or not Noordin and Abdurahman had a previous relationship, and the meeting that Zuhri brokered may have been the pair's first direct interaction. With the relationship established (or reinforced), Abdurahman then arranged for Ali Muhammad bin Abdullah, a contact in Saudi Arabia who is sometimes also referenced as Abdurahman's brother, to transmit 10,000 USD to Noordin.[99]

Despite the Saudi connection, it remains to be proven that al-Qaida played any direct role in the funding of the 2009 hotel bombing. However, Abdurahman's ties to the organization raise the possibility of its involvement. While studying in Pakistan, he purportedly interacted with members of al-Qaida and the Taliban, and given that in 2003 his classmate, Gunawan, held direct links to KSM's nephew, Ali al-Azia Ali (a.k.a. Ammar al-Baluchi), these assertions seem exceptionally credible. However, Abdurahman's later interactions with bin Laden's organization are somewhat speculative. He reportedly returned to Pakistan at least briefly in 2007, and renewed these connections,[100] but detailed evidence on the specifics of these interactions with al-Qaida has yet to emerge. Therefore, it would be premature to conclude that bin Laden's organization orchestrated the attack's funding, especially if the alleged family ties between Abdurahman and Ali Muhammad bin Abdullah prove true. That said, al-Qaida's financial role in the 2009 attacks remains an intriguing possibility that merits additional investigation as new evidence emerges into the open-source.

6.6.3 TRAINING

Beyond the influence that he exerted from the pulpit, Syaifudin Jaelani appears to have played a role in the ideological component of the training that preceded the 2009 attack. Specifically, his role seems to have been to _ripen' prospective suicide-bombers, whom he groomed for jihad under the guise of youth counseling. For example, in the months preceding the attacks, he took Dani, the Marriott bomber, and a handful of other teenage boys on otherwise unsupervised camping trips southeast of Jakarta.[101]

At a more technical level, Azahari still dominated the training of the operation's bomb-makers, despite his death. The Indonesian police assert that Eko's bomb-designs were entirely based on the schematics that Azahari had created for the backpack-bombs used in the 2005 Bali attacks.[102] Because the record does not specify that Eko ever trained directly under Azahari, the bomb-maker in the 2009 attacks may have been somewhat akin to a home cook who tries to recreate a restaurant-chef's recipes by following a cookbook, without the benefit of the tacit knowledge that instructors pass-on through hands-on tutorials. The attendant drop-off in experience inherent to this type of training may go a long way toward explaining why the time-bomb left on the Marriott's upper floors failed. Unless additional information emerges suggesting that Eko studied bomb-making more formally with individuals outside of TQJ, it seems safe to conclude that neither al-Qaida nor JI played a direct training role in the 2009 hotel bombings.

6.6.4 SUMMATION

As in the 2005 Bali bombing, TQJ seems to have functioned largely independently in the 2009 hotel attacks. There is no clear evidence that al-Qaida orchestrated the attack‘s funding, nor is there any clear evidence that any active members of the attack team ever received training in an al-Qaida camp. Given the ambiguity that surrounds many aspects of the attack, it is difficult to be overly firm in these conclusions, but it seems that bin Laden‘s organization was, at best, weakly tied to the 2009 hotel attacks.

JI‘s role in the attacks is slightly more complex. Several members of the attack team, most notably Noordin, held historical membership in the organization, and in the absence of other explanations, the most likely source of explosives used in the 2009 attack was a surplus that JI stored with Noordin‘s father-in-law. Effectively, it seems that these logistical supplies followed Baharudin Latif from JI into TQJ. However, JI played no direct role in training the 2009 team; its members either relied on the organization‘s existing knowledge resources, as epitomized by Eko‘s use of Azahari‘s bomb-designs, or they received instruction from other members of TQJ, as demonstrated by Syaifudin Jaelani‘s involvement in the ripening process. Ultimately, it seems that the 2009 attack was also weakly tied to JI.

6.7 NETWORK MEASURES

Because this chapter considers a series of events that not only occupy the same Baleian category populated by events in which al-Qaida played a weak functional role, but which also consistently involve some common actors, namely Noordin and Azahari, this chapter‘s cases are similar enough to ensure that formal comparisons between the networks that perpetrated the events under analysis meet the standards of construct validity. These quantitative measurements, which are outlined in the section below, tell the same story as the qualitative narrative and demonstrate that although that Noordin and Azahari were of no particular structural importance in the network that perpetrated the 2002 Bali bombings, the networks which conducted the 2003 bombing of the Jakarta Marriott, the 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta, the 2005 bombings in Jimbarong Beach and Kuta on Bali, and the 2009 bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz Carlton hotels were structurally dependent on these men. Put more simply, the 2002 Bali bombings would have taken place with or without Noordin and Azahari, but the networks which perpetrated every well-known Islamist-motivated terror attack in Indonesia from 2003 to 2009 would never have existed without the pair.

The simplest way to view the events in this chapter is as a single-mode network depicting the entire period of analysis as a single snap-shot. Figure 6.1 offers a visualization of a static agent x agent network containing functional connections between individuals involved in the 2002 Bali bombings, the 2003 Jakarta Marriott bombing, the 2004 Australian Embassy bombings, the 2005 Bali bombings, and the 2009 bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz-Carlton Hotels.[103] Visual interpretation of this graph makes two things immediately apparent. First, the information surrounding Indonesian extremism is imperfect, because the presence of two isolate nodes demonstrates that nothing is known about some Indonesian jihadists' relationships or the nature of their involvement in violence, other than that they played some vague functional role in one of the same attacks as Noordin. Consequently, it is clear that the values of any measures derived from the network depicted in Figure 6.1 would change with perfect information. With the significant caveats implicit to this finding, the second conclusion that can be obtained from visual interpretation of the graph is that Noordin and Azahari, who have been highlighted in blue, play important roles in binding the network together.

[103] Because participation in the 2002 Bali bombings, the 2003 bombing of the Jakarta Marriott, the 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta, the 2005 bombings in Jimbarong Beach and Kuta on Bali, and the 2009 bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz Carlton hotels served as the selection criteria for inclusion in this network, it would be inappropriate to include in the network ties inferred from participation in these events. Indeed, doing so would create perfect cliques for each event, because every participant would be linked to every other. Therefore, the agent x agent connections displayed in Figure 6.1 and analyzed in subsequent graphs exclude such ties.

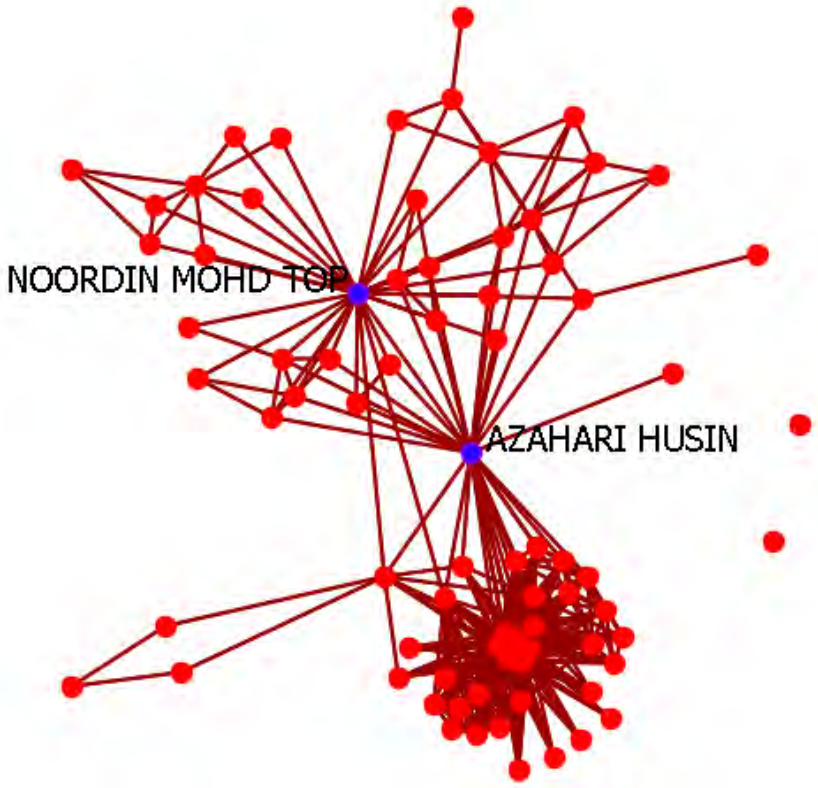
Figure 6.1: Agent x Agent Network Depicting Relationships Between Individuals Involved in Terror Attacks Involving Noordin Mohd Top, 2002-2009



Formal measures of centrality offer a means to quantify the extent of this importance. Figure 6.2 summarizes betweenness, closeness, and total degree scores for the same flat agent x agent network depicted above. Owing to discussions in the second and third chapters, betweenness and degree are familiar concepts, but as this analysis has not previously discussed closeness, this measurement merits a brief definitional note. Closeness offers an index measurement of the geodesic distance between an actor and all other nodes in the graph. Consequently, it serves as a measurement of reachability; those with high closeness scores can most easily reach (and be reached by) other members of the network. 104

The graphs in Figure 6.2 demonstrate that although other agents hold more ties than Noordin and Azahari, and although other agents are far more reachable than Noordin and Azahari—a factor largely attributable to the pair's relatively light involvement in the 2002 Bali bombings and consequent isolation from many of that attack's participants—the pair scored exceptionally high in betweenness. Noordin ranked first in this measurement, while Azahari ranked fourth, coming in behind Ali Ghufron and Imam Samudra, whose shared organizational duties in the 2002 Bali bombings, the attack with the largest network of participants, granted them high betweenness scores, despite their lack of participation in any subsequent attacks. Thus, even when the period of Noordin's functional involvement in terrorism is viewed in a static, one-mode perspective, it is clear that Noordin and Azahari held Indonesia's community of Islamist terrorist together throughout the bulk of the first decade of the new millennium.

Introducing a two-mode perspective drives home the importance of Noordin and Azahari‘s shared role in linking prominent Indonesian-based terror attacks between 2002 and 2009. Figure 6.3 contains two panels. The upper one shows agents‘ known connections to attacks; the lower panel shows the same information, only with Noordin and Azahari removed from the network. If not for this pair, the 2005 Bali bombings and the 2009 bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels would have been entirely disconnected from the remaining attacks, and the 2004 bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta would have been connected only though Agus Hidayat, a disciple of Imam Samudra‘s who participated in the gold store robbery that supported the 2002 Bali bombings and who helped to secure explosives in support of the 2004 attack. The obvious conclusion is that Noordin and Azahari were the primary architects of the broader campaign of terror that took place in Indonesia in the years following the first Bali bombings.

While the preceding assessments demonstrate Noordin and Azahari's strategic role in orchestrating terror attacks in Indonesia in the 2000s, they say little about the nature of the pair's involvement organizing the teams responsible for each attack individually. This aspect of Noordin and Azahari's leadership is perhaps best demonstrated by examining fragmentation, a measurement that examines both the percentage of disconnected nodes that exist in a given network and the relative cohesion of the connected components.[105] Figure 6.4 summarizes a simulation-based approach to estimating Azahari and Noordin's role in organizing each of the attacks discussed in this chapter. The graphs compare fragmentation scores for agent x agent networks depicting functional relationships among each attacks' known participants. The blue bars depict scores for the complete network as it appears in the data. The maroon bars depict scores that would have resulted if Noordin and Azahari had not participated in the attacks. Finally, the green bar represents a special case, depicting the score that would have resulted if Ibrohim, the florist who conducted much of the tactical planning of the 2009 bombings of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels, had not participated in Noordin's final attack.

Like the other formal network measures presented in this section, fragmentation scores provide a quantitative estimate that mirrors previously presented qualitative interpretations. The numbers demonstrate that Noordin and Azahari's removal from the 2002 Bali bombings would have done little to fracture the network responsible for that attack—hardly a surprising finding given that Noordin's role was limited to participation in a single early strategy meeting and that Azahari became involved in the attack's tactical details almost by accident, when the pair arrived at Ali Ghufron's house unannounced and unexpected. However, Noordin and Azahari were lynchpins that held together the network that perpetrated the 2003 Jakarta Marriott bombing, as demonstrated by the roughly 300 percent increase in fragmentation that resulted from their simulated removal from that network. Though the numbers are not quite as profound for the 2004 Australian Embassy bombings and the 2005 Bali bombings, the pattern is the same: the respective attack networks would have been 1.5 times more fragmented without Noordin and Azahari's participation. It seems clear that the networks responsible for these attacks would have lacked the structure necessary to act as a team without the pair's leadership.

However, at a tactical level, this is not true of the 2009 bombing of the Jakarta Marriott and Ritz-Carlton hotels. Although Noordin served as a bridge that tied this event to earlier attacks, he was far less structurally important to the 2009 attack network than he had been to previous teams in 2003, 2004, and 2005. Instead, Ibrohim, the florist who had been observed the hotels since taking work in a flower shop in the lobby of the Marriott in 2005 and was thus in the best position to plan tactical details, held the attack team together. Azahari was dead by the time of the 2009 attacks and was thus irrelevant to the attack team's structure; Noordin's removal would have barely impacted the attack team's structural cohesion, but the team would have been nearly 50 percent more fragmented without Ibrohim. Thus, the evidence suggests that near the end of his life, Noordin was becoming increasingly willing to allow others to assume tactical responsibility for attacks, while simultaneously positioning himself to design grand strategy.

6.8 CONCLUSION

Like most durable organizations, al-Qaida certainly plans for the future. However, the five cases discussed in this chapter demonstrate that minor evolutionary shifts play at least as large a role as high-level strategic visions in determining the nature of inter-organizational cooperation within the broader jihadist movement. Beginning in 2003, Noordin began a journey toward organizational independence that would take roughly two years to complete. By viewing his attacks in sequence, it becomes clear that TQJ's emergence as an independent organization that served as al-Qaida's ideological standard bearer in Southeast Asia was the result of Noordin's incrementally increasing entrepreneurialism, rather than any sort of strategic vision orchestrated by al-Qaida. Indeed, by the time that he claimed to be working in al-Qaida's name, his functional connections to bin Laden's organization had reached their nadir. Therefore, as summarized by table 6.1, the events in which Noordin participated suggest that al-Qaida's regional partnerships may largely exist in name only.

These conclusions suggest that the theories of organizational cooperation advanced by Mendelsohn, Braniff, and Moghadam need to be revised to include the perspective of the al-Qaida‘s prospective collaborators alongside al-Qaida‘s strategic aims. Put more simply, theory must recognize that organizational cooperation is a two-way street that requires the consent of both parties. Unfortunately, neither Noordin nor his primary operational partner, Azahari Husin, can be questioned regarding their reasons for choosing to operate under al-Qaida‘s name, as both men died before they could be taken into custody. Consequently, this chapter cannot offer an empirically-based revision to existing theory, but at a minimum, future studies should rigorously explore three possible causal mechanisms that lead independent organizations to adopt al-

Qaida's name: (1) organizations may choose to operate under al-Qaida's banner because they fully adhere to the organization's ideological vision; (2) organizations may choose to operate under al-Qaida's banner because they receive greater media attention and notoriety than they would if they operated under their original name; and (3) organizations may choose to operate under al-Qaida's banner because they receive some sort of tangible rewards from bin Laden's organization for doing so, such as better access to al-Qaida's training infrastructure, logistical resources, or operational funds.

Beyond theories of cooperation within the violent Islamist movement, this chapter's conclusions also have broader implications for the literature that discusses the formation of splinter groups. The history of political extremism is replete with cases in which a radical splinter group formed because the main body of a terrorist organization entered into a peace agreement with the existing state authorities. Ireland offers the clearest illustration: the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) gave birth to the Continuity Irish Republican Army (CIRA) in 1994, when a minority faction objected to a cease-fire with the British government, and in 1997, the Real Irish Republican Army (RIRA) formed when another break-away faction of PIRA members opposed the organization's pledge to pursue independence only through democracy and non-violence.[106] Noordin's example suggests that this literature needs to be amended to make clear that splinters can also form gradually, as the result of a budding leader's entrepreneurialism. However, additional broad-based research is necessary to determine the relative prevalence of the patterns suggested by Noordin's experience.

In combination with the preceding two chapters‘ discussion of events that display strong functional ties to al-Qaida, this evaluation concludes this study‘s inquiry into al-Qaida‘s direct, active involvement in Islamist terrorism. Subsequent chapters turns their attention towards more diffuse forms of involvement, an assessment that begins by examining events perpetrated by former members of bin Laden‘s organization.

7.0 AL-QAIDA'S ALUMNI: THE HISTORICAL NATURE OF RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN BIN LADEN'S ORGANIZATION AND ITS REGIONAL AFFILIATES

A handful of prominent academics continue to argue that al-Qaida continued to maintain hierarchical control over the violent Islamist movement throughout the organization's history. For example, writing in 2011, Hoffman implicitly attributed the organization with a functional role in regional operations by arguing that, "Pakistan, Yemen, Somalia, and perhaps parts of North Africa remain key operational areas where al Qaeda's strength has yet to dissipate."[1] Similarly, analysts at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) have argued that al-Qaida's regional affiliates currently show greater coordination than ever before.[2] Indeed, in 2011, they continued to describe the organization as "a terrorist 'Hydra' with global reach," whose appeal to some segments of the Muslim population continued to widen.[3]

Yet others theorists and some members of the intelligence community are incredibly skeptical of such assertions. Writing in 2011, Fawas Gerges labeled such assessments "unconvincing" and argued that the statements about al-Qaida's role in regional operations were —based more on risk assessment and speculation than hard facts."[4] Even more damningly, a senior intelligence official with knowledge of the treasure-trove of documents captured from the Abbottabad compound where bin Laden was killed claimed the dissident Saudi had become largely marginalized by the time of his death, arguing that in latter years Islamists viewed bin Laden —like the cranky old uncle" whose opinion was heard out of respect, and then promptly ignored.[5]

In short, the nature of al-Qaida's interactions with regional affiliates remains an open question, because there is no consensus among reputable analysts. However, this analysis presents evidence that broadly refutes assertions that al-Qaida currently controls or directs the actions of its regional affiliates. Indeed, case studies of al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) suggest that the relationships between the core of bin Laden's organization and its regional affiliates have waned over time. Several members of AQIM and AQAP once held enough functional ties to the highest echelons of al-Qaida's leadership to be considered members of bin Laden's organization in their own right, but some combination of time, distance, and, in some cases, incarceration broke these bonds. A measure of ideological congruity exists between these regional groups and al-Qaida—it seems especially profound in the case of AQAP—but the operating environments that exist in the Sahara and Yemen suggest that there are scant reasons to suspect that bin Laden's organization contributes to the logistics or finance or AQIM or AQAP. Indeed, these organizations' financial and logistical independence offers one likely explanation for AQIM and AQAP's increasing functional distance from al-Qaida. Historical training relationships ultimately constitute the strongest links between these groups and al-Qaida.

This chapter contains three sections following this introduction. The first two each discuss one of the regional affiliates mentioned above, before the third section offers some brief conclusions. The internal structure of the cases also follows the same format as previous chapters and contains break-outs on planning, finance and logistics, and training, followed by brief comparative summations. However, data limitations preclude this chapter from adopting the events-oriented perspective that dominates the other qualitative chapters of this analysis; the open-source record simply does not contain enough information on individual attacks conducted by AQIM and AQAP to allow the organizations to be studied with the same level of granularity. Consequently, this chapter‘s level of analysis is the organization, not the event. Because many facets of the analysis must also be made by proxy, this chapter‘s conclusions are less robust than those offered by the other, more detailed chapters.

7.1 AL-QAIDA IN THE ISLAMIC MAGHREB

AQIM has deep roots in Algeria‘s insurgency. In the late 1980s, the Algerian government introduced political reforms that allowed for a multi-party system, but when the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), a religiously-inspired political party, gained worrying levels of support in the early 1990s, the military delayed and then ultimately cancelled parliamentary elections to preclude what the nation‘s ruling elites feared would be an extremist take-over of the government. A military crack-down on FIS ensued, and when the organization‘s supporters fought back, the situation quickly escalated into a wide-spread insurgency.[6] Within this context, the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) emerged in the early 1990s; the organization's expressed goal was to overthrow Algeria's secular government and impose Sharia law.[7] However, by the late 1990s, the tide had turned against the Islamist group, when the military regained territory,[8] and a civil concord granted pardons to thousands of former insurgents, thereby depleting GIA's ranks.[9]

However, hardliners refused to lay-down their arms, and the GIA continued to widely target civilians in an attempt to perpetuate the conflict. In disagreement with this tactic, Hassan Hattab formed a splinter-group in 1998 that was dedicated to attacking government targets; he dubbed the new organization the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC).[10] By 2003, Hattab proved too moderate for his followers, who ousted him in favor of Nabil Sahrawi, an adherent to the Salafist vision of global Sunni theocracy. With this leadership change, the GSPC abandoned Hattab's prohibition on civilian attacks—in practice, the organization never adhered to this principle—and attempted to forge closer ties to al-Qaida.[11] Sahrawi's death the following year prevented him from realizing a partnership with bin Laden's organization,[12] but in 2006, his successor, Abdelmalik Droukdal, announced that the GSPC had 'merged' with al-Qaida and would henceforth be known as al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM).[13]

However, a great deal of evidence belies this apparent unity. Bin Laden's organization seems to lack a direct role in AQIM's planning, though a small handful of events suggest that al-Qaida may have influenced the strategic trajectory of the North African organization. Yet, AQIM is entirely independent in terms of finance and logistics, and it seems that training ties between the two organizations have become largely historical. A small number of AQIM members once held demonstrable membership in al-Qaida, but these relationships have waned. Therefore, the evidence strongly suggests that despite AQIM's name change, any ongoing functional ties between the organization and al-Qaida are exceptionally weak.

7.1.1 PLANNING

The available evidence is hardly conclusive, but it suggests that AQIM's planning decisions flow through a fairly hierarchical structure. According to Abdelmalek Droukdal, who has served at the organization's titular emir since 2004,[14] major strategic decisions are made by "an advice council and senate" that first conducts after-action reviews of previous attacks, before setting new objectives.[15] According to Droukdal's version of events, decisions then flow downward to regional commanders who head divisions known as katibats, the boundaries of which roughly align with the six military districts established by the Algerian government.[16]

Statements offered by Wolfgang Ebner, an Austrian tourist who witnessed AQIM first-hand after the organization kidnapped him from the Sahara in March 2008, suggest that the organization's hierarchical structure extends with the katibats. Ebner describes small attack-teams that exist at the bottom-end of ―a completely hierarchical system," and which follow orders issued by ―The leader of AQIM in the mountains of Algeria."[17] However, the United Nations has suggested that senior leaders of the organization are often intimately involved in the tactical planning of attacks. For example, in April 2007, Droukdal, who began his career as a bomb-maker, allegedly personally supervised car-bombings that targeted government and police facilities in Algiers.[18] Thus, despite the organization's apparent hierarchy, AQIM's senior leaders seem prone to micro-managing events on the ground.

[16] "Terrorist Salafi Group Reportedly Set Up New Structures in Algeria," BBC Monitoring Middle East, March 27, 2006. It is important to note that these military districts are not synonymous with the government's internal administrative divisions, because Algeria contains 48 provinces, and it remains unclear how the military structure overlays with these political distinctions. For information on the country's provinces, see: Central Intelligence Agency, "The World Factbook: Algeria," February 15, 2012; available online: https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ag.html.

A measure of dysfunction has also mitigated the clarity of AQIM's command structure. Circa 2004, Mokhtar Belmokhtar (a.k.a. Khalid Abu al-Abbas), who has commanded a katibat in south-Saharan Algeria since the mid-1990s,[19] began to operate with increasing disregard for AQIM's central leadership. The reasons for Belmokhtar's disobedience were clear: because his Saharan operations provided the bulk of AQIM's financial revenue, he believed that he should have been named the organization's emir[20] when Nabil Sahrawi's death in June 2004 vacated the position.[21] Belmokhtar's split with AQIM's leadership was profound enough that some regional media outlets began referring to him as a ―former leader" of the organization,[22] and in 2011,

Belmokhtar admitted that he had had, in his words, "a dispute of diversity" with AQIM's leadership.[23]

However, he stressed that the disagreement was conducted with "Islamic manners and ethics and mutual respect,"[24] and his split with the organization was never complete, because the disgruntled commander continued to cooperate with AQIM-proper when it was to his benefit.[25] Though the information is of debatable provenance because it comes from within the organization, Belmokhtar's recent comments stress that the organization is now fully unified.[26] On balance, Belmokhtar's on-again-off-again relationship with Droukdal's central committee suggests that regional leaders direct the actions of attack-teams, without seeking approval from their supposed superiors within the AQIM hierarchy.

This conclusion has fairly clear implications for the nature of the broader organization: AQIM seems more like a collection of loosely affiliated sub-regional groups than like a single cohesive organization. Internally, katibats likely have the sort of hierarchical structure described by AQIM's former captives, but each of these geographic divisions seems to function as a regional commander's personal fiefdom. It seems that the organization's central leadership rules by consensus and influence, rather than autocratic decree. Put differently, the evidence suggests that AQIM is more of an umbrella organization, in which the emir and the central committee are somewhat constrained in their ability to plan organization-wide strategy and operations.

AQIM's international components further muddy the waters of the organization's already murky command structure and planning apparatus. In addition to its Algerian-based katibats, AQIM also seems to maintain a small European presence. For example, in the early 2000s, the Italian government imprisoned several alleged members of the organization on charges of document forgery and provision of material support to terrorism.[27] However, Droukdal disavowed these operatives by stating that European governments' collective claim to have detained members of his organization ~~is~~ a lie, and deception, and injustice."[28] While he went-on to claim that AQIM had other sympathizers based ~~in~~ Europe and elsewhere,"[29] and although AQIM has been linked to a small handful of failed plots in Europe,[30] the organization has yet to successfully complete an attack outside of North Africa. Thus, AQIM's overseas presence is likely quite small, and it remains unclear to whom, if anyone, AQIM members abroad report.

The bulk of the organization's capabilities outside of Algeria exist in the border regions of the country's Saharan neighbors. Specifically, AQIM operatives have frequently stashed kidnapping victims in Northern Mali to place them beyond the reach of Algerian authorities.[31] In 2005 and 2008, AQIM also conducted attacks on Mauritanian military outposts,[32] and in 2008, the organization kidnapped a pair of Canadian diplomats in Niger.[33] The robustness of AQIM's non-Algerian operations is, however, subject to debate, because the incidents in Mauritania and Niger may have indicated that the organization conducts brief cross-border raids, rather than maintaining sustainable capabilities outside of Algeria. Moreover, if AQIM does possess divisions in non-Algerian portions of the Sahara, the nature of their reporting relationships with Droukdal's central committee, or, for that matter, their relationship to any of the organization's more-established regional leaders, is unknown. Given these uncertainties, as well as the fact that all of the men reported to be high-level AQIM leaders have been Algerian,[34] it would be somewhat disingenuous to characterize the group as a true regional concern. Although AQIM's name references the whole of the Islamic Maghreb, the organization is primarily Algerian.

Moreover, the nature of the organization's strategic relationship to al-Qaida and its broader global agenda remain ambiguous. According to Belmokhtar, he has been in communication on AQIM's behalf with high-ranking members of bin Laden's organization since sometime in 2000,[35] and Droukdal claims that in 2004 he began trading emails with Abu Musab al-Zarqawi,[36] the Jordanian jihadist who led al-Qaida in Iraq's insurgency against coalition Nabil Sahrawi, who replaced Hatab as AQIM's top leader circa 2003, originally hailed from Constantie, Algeria. forces until his death in 2006.[37] Later that year, AQIM, formally changed its name from "the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat" to reflect an allegiance with bin Laden's organization[38] and has since made several statements that mirror al-Qaida's stridently anti-American rhetoric.[39] Thus, the two organizations' strategic objectives at least partially overlap, but it would be premature to conclude that a true operational merger has taken place, because the nature of AQIM's attacks has remained largely consistent throughout the organization's history.

By and large, AQIM has undertaken armed assaults against Algerian government targets[40] and conducted profit-motivated kidnappings.[41] In recent years, the organization has begun to bargain hostages for the release of group members held in Algerian and Malian prisons in lieu of cash payments,[42] but three incidents merit closer examination because they set precedents that may indicate AQIM has become more closely engaged with bin Laden's organization. Ultimately, the evidence suggests that links between the two organizations require careful monitoring, but it would be premature to conclude that AQIM takes formal direction from al-Qaida.

The first incident occurred in 2007, when AQIM conducted its first known martyrdom operation by suicide-bombing a pair of government targets in Algiers. Many analysts hailed this event as evidence that AQIM had begun to take its cues directly from bin Laden's organization,[43] and indeed AQIM has since made regular use of suicide-bombings as a means of attack. Exact counts vary by source, but range in the neighborhood of 15 incidents.[44]

However, other Algerian organizations perpetrated suicide-attacks long before AQIM claimed to have ties to bin Laden's organization. For example, in 1995, the GIA—the organization from which AQIM ultimately descended—suicide-bombed a police station in Algiers,[45] and in 1998 suicide-bombers killed half a dozen civilians in Medea Province.[46] Thus, it would be inaccurate to infer that al-Qaida necessarily brought this tactic to AQIM, because a limited tradition of suicide-bombing already independently existed in Algeria. Moreover, since 2007, the bulk of AQIM's operations have continued to utilize other modes of attack, so it remains to be proven that the nature of the North African organization's strategy and tactics have fundamentally changed since it formally affiliated with al-Qaida.

The second precedent-setting event occurred in 2009, when AQIM attempted to exchange the hostage Edwin Dyer, an Englishman, for Abu Qatada, an al-Qaida-affiliated Islamist cleric held in Britain on terror charges.[47] Although AQIM has typically treated hostages as a valuable commodity worth protecting—Belmokhtar once even brought-in a physician to treat a hostage's injuries[48]—the organization ultimately executed Dyer when the British government refused to negotiate.[49] This event constitutes a worrying example, but since other Western hostages have since been released when AQIM's ransom demands were met,[50] the Dyer execution hardly represented a sea-change in AQIM's treatment of abductees. Put differently, the Dyer execution seems to have represented an aberrant event rather than a tipping-point in the nature of AQIM kidnappings.

The final precedent-setting event also took place in 2009, when AQIM killed Christopher Legget, an American teacher, in an ambush-style shooting in Mauritania.[51] The organization cited Legget's "Christianization activities" as the reason for the killing,[52] thereby demonstrating that AQIM is willing to back-up its rhetoric regarding America's participation in a Zionist-Crusader alliance. However, it is necessary to consider the scale of this action. The shooting was conducted by three men, who operated without much, if any, support from AQIM's broader organization.[53] Moreover, none of the currently available evidence suggests that bin Laden's organization played any role in the attack. A single murder carried out by operatives working in isolation is a far cry from a coordinated, multi-organizational assault on American interests in the region.

These events may suggest that AQIM has begun to adopt al-Qaida's strategic objectives, but this trend ultimately seems limited, because the bulk of AQIM's attacks continue to follow historical patterns. In short, AQIM seems to plan the majority of its attacks not to advance a pan-Islamist agenda, but instead to bloody the nose of the Algerian government, to achieve small specific goals such as hostage exchanges, or to obtain financial reward. Assertions that AQIM has fully merged with al-Qaida, or that members of bin Laden's organization play a direct role in the planning of AQIM attacks, likely overstate the case.

7.1.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Nor does al-Qaida have a demonstrable role in AQIM's logistics. For example, AQIM staffs the kidnapping gangs that comprise its best known and most active component without assistance. Former hostages claim that the most junior members of the attack-teams are teenage boys, many of whom hail from the Western Sahara. Even their hostages characterize these boys as victims, who were abandoned by families that were unable to provide for their care.[54] Thus, AQIM acquires some of its personnel by serving as a surrogate family that provides shelter and sustenance to the disenfranchised, but lest the organization seem benevolent, it is important to note that former captives have also spoken about vague "sexual problems" among these boys,[55] which suggests that some of AQIM's more predatory members likely treat their younger subordinates as playthings that can be molested at will.

[53] "Christopher Leggett killing: Mauritania death penalty."
[54] "Die sehen Osterreich als muslimishes Land."
[55] Ibid.

Beyond the teenagers, the kidnapping gangs also contain several older men who former hostages describe as "mercenaries." Victims allege that senior kidnappers were primarily interested in generating revenue to support families living in their home villages.[56] Therefore, like the teenage boys, these attackers' primary motivation for participation seems to be economic, rather than ideological.[57]

This trend is also evident in a third group that participates in AQIM kidnappings: the Toureg tribe, an ethnic group that controls territory in the Sahara stretching from Eastern Morocco to Western Libya.[58] According to the North African media, Belmokhtar married into this ethnic group,[59] and several of his new kinsmen then began to work indirectly in the interests of AQIM. Without the organization's advanced consent, they abducted tourists from the desert and then attempted to sell their victims to Belmokhtar. Edwin Dyer, the British hostage that AQIM executed when the British government refused to release Abu Qatada, was reportedly abducted this way.[60] Similarly, the Touregs accidentally killed a group of Saudis falconers during a botched speculative-kidnapping in late 2009.[61] While the Touregs seem to have functioned more as AQIM's outside business partners than dedicated members of the organization, their example serves to reinforce the role that economic concerns play in staffing AQIM operations.

However, it would be somewhat disingenuous to suggest that radical ideology lacks a role in the organization, because a fourth and final contingent of members seems to have been directly recruited from religious schools operating in North Africa. AQIM's former hostages described several of their captors as exceptionally devout twenty-somethings, who prayed regularly and were so unwilling to cast their eyes upon Western women that they always turned their gaze away from the _indecency' of their female captives.[62] Unfortunately, it remains impossible to scale the relative roles that economics and religion play in AQIM's recruitment strategy, because both factors likely motivate many members, and because the total size of the organization remains unknown.[63] But regardless of the breakdown, it seems clear that al-Qaida lacks a direct role, since even AQIM's most devout members hail from local sources.

AQIM's persistent participation in kidnapping also speaks to the organization's financial independence. The exact amount of revenue AQIM has derived from kidnapping remains unknown, but David S. Cohen, the U.S. Treasury Department's Under Secretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence, approximated the value at —tens of millions of dollars" as of the fall of 2011.[64] Moreover, AQIM also reaps proceeds from other forms of crime. For example, the organization frequently extorts money from the Algerian citizenry by taxing travelers for passage through illegal road blocks,[65] and AQIM has a well-documented history of informally taxing goods smuggled through the Sahara.[66]

Some sources allege that AQIM has also become actively involved in smuggling of a host of illicit commodities, most notably arms and tobacco.[67] Purportedly, Belmokhtar's role in cigarette trafficking had become so widespread that by 2003, he was known regionally as the "Marlborough Godfather."[68] Along similar lines, there are persistent allegations that portions of AQIM have also become involved in narcotics trafficking,[69] though the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime remains skeptical that that the Sahara has become a drug-smuggling route, stating flatly that "there have been few seizures to support this claim."[70] Moreover, Belmokhtar, the AQIM member whose name surfaces most often in regards to narcotics, unequivocally denies his participation in this trade, stating that "the illegitimacy of drugs or trafficking of it . . . even to the land of the Kuffar (nonbelievers) is from the most obvious haram (prohibition) in the Sharia (religious law) of Allah Almighty."[71] Thus, even though the data on AQIM's role in the drug trade is exceptionally speculative, the organization's many other criminal pursuits dictate that some katibats function largely as criminal enterprises, rather than hardcore violent Islamist cells bent on the destruction of the West.

Moreover, AQIM's illicit exploits say a great deal about the nature of the organization's logistical relationship to al-Qaida. Belmokhtar's Saharan smuggling concerns and the group's broader participation in profit-motivated kidnappings provide not only revenue ample enough to ensure the organization's financial independence, but also the criminal contacts necessary to ensure independent access to weapons. In short, there is little reason to assume that AQIM relies on bin Laden's organization for any sort of financial or logistical assistance.

7.1.3 TRAINING

Beyond AQIM's vague ideological overlap with al-Qaida, training ties offer the clearest evidence of a relationship between the organizations. For example, the United Nations alleges that European-based members of the GSPC, the forerunner to AQIM, funneled recruits to bin Laden-affiliated camps in the late 1990s.[72] Similarly, detainees captured by American forces have admitted that an "Algerian Center" existed within al-Qaida's Khaldan Camp at that time.[73]

However, the evidence suggests that the vast majority of these ties have become historical, while others were always somewhat indirect. Italian authorities dismantled GSPC's European operations with a wave of arrests in 2001,[74] to say nothing of Droukdal's disavowal of those operatives. Moreover, many of the Algerians who trained at Khaldan never returned to their home country and instead worked for al-Qaida in either South Asia[75] or Bosnia.[76] Therefore, although training ties clearly exist between al-Qaida and AQIM, they are neither particularly strong nor especially current.

Belmokhtar, AQIM's most notable al-Qaida trainee, offer a complimentary example that also demonstrates that the training relationship between AQIM and al-Qaida has likely waned.

According to an account he provided to the Algerian media, Belmokhtar trained in al-Qaida's Jihad Wal and Khaldan Camps in 1991, and then spent an additional year operating in Afghanistan alongside members of bin Laden's organization, before returning to Algeria sometime in 1993, and taking-up arms on behalf of the insurgent group GIA.[77] Circa 1994, his superiors in this organization tasked him to make contact with his former colleagues in al-Qaida, who had since relocated to the Sudan,[78] but whether as the result of the difficulties bin Laden's organization subsequently faced when its relationship with Hassan al-Turabi deteriorated, or as the result of turmoil that accompanied the split within GIA that led to the foundation of the GSPC, Belmokhtar apparently lost contact with al-Qaida for about half a decade. He claims that his first attempt "to unite the ranks of [Algerian] mujahidin with [their] brothers in Al-Qaeda" took place in 2000.[79] Thus, Belmokhtar's own statements regarding his personal history suggest that AQIM's training relationship with al-Qaida devolved over time, despite the unity implied by the North African group's 2006 name change.

Iraq may provide a partial exception to this conclusion. The Sinjar Records, comprised of documents captured from Islamist insurgents in October 2007, contained country-of-origin data on 595 foreign-fighters in Iraq, 49 of whom (8.1 percent) hailed from Algeria.[80] However, the strength of the relationship between violent Islamists operating in Iraq and bin Laden's organization is subject to debate, because prominent leaders in Iraq displayed tremendous operational independence, even when they operated under al-Qaida's banner. For example, although Abu Musab al-Zarqawi swore formal allegiance to bin Laden in 2004,[81] the Jordanian openly ignored al-Qaida's efforts to sew unity among the diverse elements of the Iraqi insurgency, when he undertook a prolonged campaign of violence against Iraqi Shiities that detracted from al-Qaida's larger organizational goal of expelling coalition forces from the region.[82] Thus, it would be premature to conclude that Iraqi groups who provided Algerian insurgents with training and experience were part-and-parcel of bin Laden's organization, and since the record has remained silent on the fate of the 49 men mentioned in the Sinjar Records, it would also be foolish to assume that all Algerian participants in the Iraqi jihad eluded death and capture to return home. A handful of Algerians may have received some meaningful training from bin Laden's organization in Iraq, but context suggests that any such interactions were few in number.

Moreover, AQIM has always had several sources of training other than al-Qaida's camps. A number of AQIM members received formal military training from the very government the organization opposes, by serving as conscripts in the Algerian military.[83] Some AQIM members even served in elite units; for example, Ammari Saifi, who was arrested in 2004 for his participation the kidnapping of European hostages from the Sahara,[84] earned the nickname "Abderrezak al-Para" because he once served as a paratrooper.[85] Given that Algeria's civil conflict has simmered for decades, other members of the organization have benefitted from training and practical experience derived from serving on the front lines with the insurgent forces that oppose the government. Ultimately, it is unclear how large a percentage of AQIM's membership received instruction from various sources, but the context suggests that there is little reason to assume strong or continuing training ties to bin Laden's organization.

7.1.4 SUMMATION

The evidence demonstrates that there is some manner of relationships between al-Qaida and AQIM. Aspects of this relationship are surface-level and primarily ideological, as best demonstrated by AQIM's name change in 2006. A handful of precedent-setting events demonstrate that the nature of the two groups' interactions requires continuous monitoring, but contrary to popular belief, the most substantive interactions between the groups are historical in nature. Individuals like Belmokhtar once held enough ties to bin Laden's organization to be considered members of al-Qaida, but these relationships have clearly faded over time. In Belmokhtar's case, the causes of this decline also seem fairly self-evident. The multi-million dollar revenues that he derives from kidnapping, illegal road blocks, cigarette smuggling, and perhaps even narcotics trafficking, have made him self-sustaining. He has the money to recruit, arm, and maintain a fighting-force without relying on material support from AQIM's central committee, much less bin Laden's organization. In short, Belmokhtar's money allows him to operate with as much independence as he chooses.

7.2 AL-QAIDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

For point of comparison, it is useful to evaluate AQIM alongside another of al-Qaida's regional affiliates, namely al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP). However, establishing AQAP's founding date is somewhat difficult, because the core of bin Laden's group has also conducted operations in the Arabian region. Most notably, in 2000, several al-Qaida members orchestrated a suicide-bombing against the U.S.S. Cole while the ship was in port at Aden, Yemen.[86] However, 2007 marks a useful distinction between the organizations, because that year, two recently-escaped convicts, whose relationship with al-Qaida was interrupted by their time in prison, announced the formation of a new al-Qaida cell operating in Yemen.[87] The following year, this new endeavor received al-Qaida's official blessing, when Ayman al-Zawahiri issued a statement describing the emir of the regional group as al-Qaida's top emissary in Yemen,[88] and AQAP adopted its current name in January 2009, when the Yemeni group announced a merger' with its Saudi Arabian counterpart,[89] which had become largely defunct following a prolonged series of raids by the Kingdom's police and intelligence services.[90] Given this context, it appears at first blush that AQAP is part and parcel of al-Qaida.

However, the evidence suggests that AQAP exhibits the same sort of waning relationship to bin Laden's organization as AQIM. Members of the Yemeni organization were once clearly members of al-Qaida, but there is scant evidence to suggest that these individuals continue to hold functional ties to bin Laden's group. Owing largely to involvement in the same sort of criminal activities that typified AQIM's experience in the Sahara, AQAP is currently financially self-reliant, though the organization does continue to receive revenue from other means. Similarly, Yemen's general lawlessness and thriving arms markets ensure that the organization has independent access to the weaponry necessary to conduct terror attacks. Definitive statements regarding al-Qaida's participation (or non-participation) in the planning of AQAP attacks are impossible to make because tremendous ambiguity surrounds this aspect of AQAP, but when viewed alongside the organization's financial and logistical independence, there is little reason to assume that bin Laden's organization plays any direct role in setting the tactics or strategies employed by AQAP. There is clear ideological congruity between al-Qaida and AQAP, but a historical training relationship ultimately offers the strongest functional tie between the two organizations.

7.2.1 PLANNING

Little is definitively known about AQAP's internal planning structure. Official characterizations stress key leaders' roles within an organizational hierarchy. For example, Nasir al-Wahishi, a Yemeni with strong historical ties to bin Laden, is invariably listed as AQAP's top leader, while Said al-Shihri, a Saudi who was once detained at Guantanamo Bay, is invariably listed as al-Wahishi's chief deputy.[91] Similarly, the United Nations alleges that Qasim al-Rimi, another Yemeni with historical ties to bin Laden's organization, serves as AQAP's senior leader for terrorist operations,"[92] while two men have at various times been cited as AQAP's chief ideologue: Ibrahim al-Rubaish,[93] another Saudi veteran of Guantanamo Bay;[94] and Anwar al-Awlaki, a now deceased[95] American-born preacher of Yemeni descent, who pledged loyalty to al-Wahishi in 2008 or 2009,[96] and who used his fluency in English to appeal to young Muslims in the West by issuing radical statements on a host of social media platforms.[97]

However, the true extent of hierarchy within AQAP is subject to debate, because the loss of individuals hailed as "key operatives" has done little to hinder the organization's operational capabilities. For example, in June 2009, Yemeni authorities announced the arrest of Hassan Hussein bin Alwan with much fanfare, claiming that the detainee was AQAP's "biggest and most influential" financier and that his arrest would be "instrumental in understanding the system of global terrorism financing."[98] Although Alwan purportedly knew all of AQAP's secrets, no massive round-up of Yemeni terror suspects followed in the wake of his capture, and AQAP managed to stage an innovative, though ultimately unsuccessful, attack on a US-flagged jetliner only six months later, when Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, a Nigerian student indoctrinated by al-Awlaki, attempted to detonate an explosive device hidden in his underpants while onboard a Detroit-bound flight on Christmas day.[99]

These events may indicate that the Yemenis merely oversold Alwan's value to AQAP, but it is equally probable that the organization is decentralized to the point that tactical-level leaders operate in smaller, largely autonomous structures that interface only sporadically with AQAP's official hierarchy.[100] In short, the currently available data on AQAP's planning structure is inconclusive, and any definitive pronouncements regarding its nature would be both biased and premature. All that can be definitively stated regarding al-Qaida's role in AQAP planning is that American-centric operations like the failed underpants bombing show that the organizations share the same strategic and ideological goals.

7.2.2 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Yemen's cash culture makes it exceptionally difficult to track the exact sources of AQAP's funding. Less than four percent of Yemenis have a bank account of any type, so nearly all of the funds that support AQAP are handled, quite literally, in bags of cash. Tracking illicit transfers from account-to-account is a difficult task even in countries that fully participate in the modern banking system, but in Yemen's largely traditional economy, the task is truly herculean.[101]

With the substantial caveat implicit to the circumstances described above, much of AQAP's money seems to come from Saudi Arabia. Charitable donations account for one revenue stream, because although Saudi authorities have curtailed religious organizations' ability to collect cash payments from anonymous donors, the practice has not been entirely eliminated. Violent Islamist groups continue to collect money from wealthy individuals, especially during the hajj, when an influx of religious pilgrims brings Muslims from the world-over into Saudi Arabia.[102] While this pattern is broadly reminiscent of al-Qaida's diversion of zakat funds, there is little reason to assume that bin Laden's organization plays a direct role. Instead, AQAP members seem to collect on their own behalf, before shuttling the money across the porous border between Saudi Arabia and Yemen.[103]

Indeed, despite efforts by Saudi authorities to construct a physical barrier between the two countries, the border remains a veritable smugglers' paradise, and illicit cross-border enterprises constitute a likely second source of revenue for AQAP. For example, in 2008, media reports claimed that "thousands of Yemenis and Africans are believed to have been leaking through the borders to Saudi Arabia daily."[104] Thus, migrant smuggling is a large and lucrative business on the Arabian Peninsula. If the trade is as ample as media sources suggest, it seems somewhat inevitable that AQAP would become involved. The lure of easy money is, after all, difficult to turn down, especially for an organization that already operates illicitly.

However, Yemen's illicit markets are hardly limited to human smuggling. Arms seizures are a near-daily occurrence on the border between Saudi Arabia and Yemen,[105] and each year Yemeni smugglers also traffic an estimated $1.75 million worth of qat, a leaf that is widely chewed throughout the Arabian Peninsula and portions of East Africa for its mild amphetamine-like effects, into Saudi Arabia, where qat is banned.[106] Consequently, AQAP is not only able to bring cash donations into Yemen without difficulty, but also likely reaps a share of income by participating in the region's thriving smuggling trade or informally taxing those who do.

Beyond charitable donations and illicit commerce, AQAP earns money through a third revenue stream: kidnapping for ransom. For example, in November 2011, three French hostages, who were abducted three-and-a-half months earlier by gunmen affiliated with high-ranking AQAP member Fahd al-Qusso, were released after their abductors received an undisclosed amount of money from an undisclosed source. Given that the kidnappers' original ransom demand was for $12 million,[107] it seems reasonable to infer that final payment was at least in the seven figure range. Thus, even a single kidnapping provides AQAP with a fairly sizeable operating budget, though it is worth noting that the organization more often seems interested in making a statement by killing Western captives than by ransoming them back to their home countries.[108] kidnap foreigners and Yemenis alike in order to force concessions from the government or regional rivals.[109] Exact statistics remain elusive, but in 2010, AKE Limited, a British insurance underwriter that keeps careful tabs on the situation because the firm is among the world's leading providers of kidnapping and ransom insurance, estimated that one to two foreigners and three to four Yemeni nationals were kidnapped per month.[110] Given this volume, and the fact that tribal elements are often involved in events alongside AQAP members,[111] it remains unclear exactly how much income the terror group derives from this source. But regardless of the ambiguities, it seems clear that AQAP's many revenue streams grant the organization financial independence from bin Laden's organization.

Similarly, Yemen's robust illicit arms markets dictate that AQAP can meet all of its weapons needs through local sources. Experts on the region's culture argue that weapons ownership is "a matter of honor" among Yemenis;[112] consequently, gun ownership rates in the country are the highest in the region. A house-to-house study conducted in 2009 estimated that private citizens owned roughly 8 million small arms,[113] and given that Yemen's population is just under 25 million,[114] there is one privately-owned gun for roughly every 3.125 people in the country, to say nothing of the worryingly large arms stockpiles maintained by the Yemeni government.[115] In recent years, when rebel campaigns and mass protests have gripped Yemen, the government has attempted to mitigate the availability of weapons in an effort toward self-preservation, but these efforts have failed almost completely. Guns of all varieties remain cheaply and easily available; merchants now simply tend to sell weapons from their homes rather than in open market stalls.[116] Thus, the average Yemeni faces about as many challenges in acquiring the materiel necessary to conduct a terrorist attack as the average Americans faces in obtaining auto parts—a circumstance which allows AQAP to remain logistically independent of bin Laden's organization.

7.2.3 TRAINING

As with AQIM, the clearest evidence of non-ideological ties between bin Laden's organization and AQAP lies in the training histories of some of the organization's prominent leaders. For example, Nasir al-Wahishi, who has served as the organization's titular emir since co-founding a Yemen-based terror cell in al-Qaida's name in 2007,[117] first formed ties to al-Qaida in 1995, when he was only 19 years-old. After studying briefly in a Yemeni religious school, al-Wahishi departed for Afghanistan in the hopes of helping to establish a "true' Islamic [115] According to diplomatic cables reproduced by the British media, Yemen purchased some $95 million in arms from a single Serbian supplier in 2009. As this transaction constitutes only one portion of the country's total weapons expenditure, the U.S. Department of State was concerned that the surplus might find its way to Yemen's thriving black market. For details, see: "US embassy cables: US fears Yemen arms purchases could end up on the black market," The Guardian, December 5, 2010; available online: http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/us-embassy-cables-documents/241318.

state. He soon became bin Laden's personal secretary and held this position until leaving Afghanistan circa 2001.[118]

However, al-Wahishi's direct ties to al-Qaida ended only two years later, when he was arrested in Iran and deported to Yemen, where he served time in prison on terror charges.[119] His career in terrorism then reignited in February 2006, when he and 22 other prisoners tunneled out of the prison using homemade shovels constructed from broomsticks and fan blades.[120] Al-Wahishi has since had some ideological interactions with bin Laden's organization; for example, Ayman al-Zawahiri formally recognized the escapee as al-Qaida's highest-ranking representative in Yemen during a statement made in November 2008.[121] However, there has been no evidence that active members of bin Laden's organization played a direct role in any of the attacks which al-Wahishi helped to plan after his escape, such as a suicide-attack on the U.S. Embassy in Sanaa in September 2008,[122] a pair of suicide-bombings against South Korean tourists in March 2009, the kidnapping of nine foreign nationals in June 2009 (three of whom were later executed), and a suicide-bombing that attempted (and failed) to kill Saudi Prince Mohammed bin Nayif in August 2009.[123]

Qasim al-Rimi offers an almost identical example. In the early 2000s, he played a role in al-Qaida's attempt to bomb the French oil-tanker Limburg, though the exact nature of his involvement remains somewhat unclear.[124] Then, in 2005, al-Rimi was sentenced to prison for plotting to assassinate the US Ambassador to Yemen,[125] but he too was able to reignite his terrorist career after escaping in the same 2006 jailbreak that freed al-Wahishi.[126] Indeed, al-Rimi joined his compatriot in announcing the foundation of an al-Qaida cell in Yemen,[127] before planning a string of independent attacks that included the suicide-bombing of Spanish tourists in 2007, [128] the kidnapping of British and German nationals in 2009,[129] and the failed suicide-operation against Prince Nayif.[130]

Nor are the pair unique. They were joined in the escape by Jamal al-Badawi,[131] an extremist who first trained with al-Qaida in 1998, and who was arrested in 2004,[132] for his playing a key logistical role in the U.S.S. Cole bombing by acquiring important resources, such as the safe-house where the explosives were prepared and the attack-boat used to deliver the suicide-bombers to the warship.[133] Although al-Badawi then turned himself into authorities in 2007, he was released to unmonitored house arrest only a few weeks later, after pledging his loyalty to the president of Yemen.[134] This soft-confinement seems to have done little to restrict al-Badawi's involvement in terrorism, because as of September 2008, he was rumored to be in contact with al-Wahishi.[135]

However, this information should not suggest that all of AQAP's al-Qaida-trained members participated in the 2006 jailbreak. For example, the man named as al-Wahishi's chief deputy, Said al-Shihri, came into the organization via detention in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.[136] Al-Shihri's involvement in terrorism began sometime in 2001, when he left his home in Riyadh for Afghanistan. After training in urban warfare at al-Qaida's "Libyan Camp" near Kabul, al-Shihri played the role of logistical facilitator, by helping to smuggle other Saudis into Afghanistan from neighboring Iran, and provided some low-level funding to bin Laden's organization by diverting small charitable donations to al-Qaida.[137] Al-Shihri was wounded and captured in the early days of the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan; he subsequently spent time at Guantanamo Bay, before being repatriated to Saudi Arabia, where he was released from detention in February 2008. Shortly thereafter, he crossed into Yemen and formed ties to al-

Wahishi and al-Badawi.[138] At last reporting, al-Shihri's role in AQAP included "identifying targets; recruiting new members; assisting with training and attack planning; and tasking others in the preparation of attacks."[139] However, there is no clear evidence to suggest that he has rekindled his contacts with members of al-Qaida's core group.

The personal history of Ibrahim al-Rubaish, the AQAP ideologue, largely mirrors al-Shihri's. In 2001, at the age of 22, al-Rubaish departed Saudi Arabia for Afghanistan, where he hoped to obtain the training necessary to allow him to fight the Russian forces oppressing Chechen Muslims. He spent time learning basic marksmanship skills at al-Qaida's Farouq Camp, but his training was apparently cut short when the camp's instructors evacuated it in the immediate aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. Al-Rubaish then spent a short time on the front lines in Tora Bora, where elements of al-Qaida and the Taliban battled the Northern Alliance, before Pakistani forces captured him in late 2001 as he attempted to flee the region when the American invasion began in full.[140] After being transferred to American custody, al-Rubaish eventually ended-up in Guantanamo Bay, but was released into the custody of Saudi authorities in December 2006.[141] It remains unclear when—and why—the Saudis released al-Rubaish, but he found his way into Yemen and AQAP by 2008.

As with AQIM, additional AQAP members have more diffuse instructional ties to bin Laden's organization that stem from participation in the Iraqi insurgency. According to the Sinjar Records, 49 of the 595 people included in the documents (8.1 percent) hailed from Yemen.[142] As in the Algerian case, it would be presumptive to assume that all of these men interacted with members of bin Laden's organization and then survived the conflict to return to Yemen, but there is additional contextual evidence suggesting that veterans of the Iraqi conflict provided AQAP with new skills.

Members of the Yemeni security community allege that the sophistication of the September 2008 suicide-bombing on the U.S. Embassy in Sanaa demonstrated that the terrorists responsible for the attack trained in Iraq, where similar coordinated strikes had become commonplace. On the morning of the bombing, one group of attackers, armed with AK-47s and rocket propelled grenades, engaged the Yemeni guards who manned a checkpoint outside the embassy, so that a second car, which carried the suicide-bombers, could make it through the embassy's outer security perimeter. However, the coordination was hardly flawless. A second ring of concrete barricades prevented the bombers from breaching the compound, and in order to avoid capture, they were forced to detonate their weapons before additional security personnel could respond. Consequently, the attack killed only ten victims, all of them Yemeni, and most of them drawn from the embassy's security detail.[143]

While the similarities between this strike and attacks in Iraq are somewhat compelling, they are not conclusive. The embassy attack may have simply drawn planning inspiration from the Iraqi insurgency. Therefore, until definitive evidence emerges showing that these or other AQAP attackers have returned from Iraq bearing new skills, it would be premature to definitively conclude that AQAP has received a direct training benefit from the insurgency, though such ties seem probable.

Finally, other members of AQAP lack any demonstrable training ties to bin Laden's organization or its Iraqi affiliate. According to regional media reports, AQAP now reportedly runs its own camps in Southern Yemen,[144] and other recruits likely benefit from experience gained though service in the Yemeni military. For example, in the summer of 2010, the Yemeni army summarily suspended some 800 soldiers without pay,[145] and regional experts have opined that these disenfranchised troops ~~c~~ould make an excellent talent pool for AQAP to target in future recruitment campaigns."[146] However, the number of AQAP recruits which have since been drawn from this pool remains unknown. Therefore, while it is clear that several high-ranking AQAP leaders benefitted directly from al-Qaida training and, indeed, once held active membership in bin Laden's organization, it remains impossible to determine what percentage of AQAP members hold training ties to al-Qaida.

7.2.4 SUMMATION

On balance, the evidence suggests that AQIM and AQAP are exceptionally similar in their ties to bin Laden's organization. Members of both the North African and Yemen-based groups once held active ties to al-Qaida, but these bonds faded over time and the regional groups began (or continued) independent operations. In AQAP's case, the severance of functional ties is far sharper, because four of the group's highest-ranking operational leaders, as well as one of AQAP's primary ideologues, re-emerged into jihad only after prolonged detention in either Yemeni prison or American military custody.

Moreover, both organizations share aspects of al-Qaida‘s ideology and attendant strategic aims, though the ideological parallels between bin Laden‘s organization and AQAP are far clearer than those between al-Qaida and AQIM. Indeed, while many of AQIM‘s attacks seem designed with economic concerns largely, if not entirely, in mind, events such as the 2008 attack on the American embassy in Sanaa and the following year‘s failed underpants bombing demonstrate that al-Qaida‘s religiously-motivated brand of anti-Americanism continues to drive many of AQAP‘s actions. Ultimately, the varying extent of AQIM and AQAP‘s ideological congruity with bin Laden‘s organization constitutes the primary difference in the two regional organizations‘ respective relationships with al-Qaida.

Ideological differences aside, it seems that exceptionally similar reasons underlie AQIM and AQAP‘s waning functional relationships with bin Laden‘s organization. Both regional groups participate extensively in criminal activities and thus have independent access to substantial revenue streams. Consequently, there is little reason to suspect that al-Qaida provides money to either organization, which prevents bin Laden‘s organization from exerting influence by pulling AQIM and AQAP‘s respective purse strings. And along similar lines, the criminal contacts that AQIM and AQAP hold as a result of their participation in smuggling, as well as the generally lawless climates of Yemen and the South Sahara, provide both organizations with independent access to arms and explosives. Thus, they are not dependent on bin Laden‘s organization to provide the materiel necessary to conduct terrorism.

Full evidence on the regional groups‘ training histories remains elusive, making it impossible to know how large a share of AQIM and AQAP‘s respective memberships benefitted directly from al-Qaida training. However, it is clear that both regional groups have other training sources at their disposal, and as these groups continue to mature, it seems likely that they will become increasingly self-reliant in terms of training. Indeed, AQAP already has an independent camp in South Yemen, and given that AQIM continues to participate in an insurgency against the Algerian and (to a lesser degree) Mauritanian governments, it seems likely that the group maintains similar facilities, though the open-source record remains mute on the specific details. These facts dictate that if and when the current generations of AQIM and AQAP leaders are removed from power, there is little reason to assume that these regional groups will continue to hold any non-ideological ties to bin Laden‘s organization.

7.3 CONCLUSION

It is difficult to be overly firm in any assessment of AQIM or AQAP, because even in comparison to other Islamist terror groups, this pair of organizations operates in environments characterized by the absence of the sort of reliable individual-level data necessary to understand the intricacies of events and organizations. While this reality creates a significant caveat to this chapter‘s findings, the open source record currently contains little evidence to support the findings of Hoffman, the analysts at CSIS, and other theorists who argue that al-Qaida‘s functional relevance to its regional affiliates is substantial or increasing. Instead, the evidence presented by this chapter, which table 7.1 summarizes, broadly supports Gerges assertion regarding the alarmist nature of conclusions positing the existence of ongoing, widespread functional linkages between al-Qaida and regional organizations that have adopted its name. Although AQIM and AQAP share some of al-Qaida‘s strategic goals, both organizations seem financial and logistically independent. The closest associations between al-Qaida and these regional groups are historical in nature and stem from historical training ties that members of AQIM and AQAP shared with bin Laden‘s organization.

However, this chapter does more than simply weigh-in on the debate regarding the extent of al-Qaida's control over the broader Islamist terror movement. This assessment also hypothesizes that regional organizations' access to financial and logistical resources is a primary determinant of the extent of their functional partnership with al-Qaida. Given that this analysis is qualitative in nature and examines only two cases, the results are somewhat speculative in nature, but suggest that organizations' access to independent revenue streams, especially highly lucrative pools of money obtained through criminal means, is inversely related to the extent of their partnership with al-Qaida. Thus, this analysis also has clear implications for future research, because as more information trickles into the open-source, it may become possible to test the range of this theory by considering organizations other than AQIM and AQAP. Similarly, the revelation of new information may make it possible to utilize rigorous formal methods that are capable of scaling the impact of resource access on the extent of partnership.

While these findings indicate that al-Qaida‘s indirect influence over the broader Islamist terror movement will continue to fade as counterterrorism initiatives remove more and more former members of the organization from active participation in violence, this evaluation is incomplete because it does not consider forms of indirect influence other than historical ties. In an effort to rectify this shortcoming, the following chapter turns its attention toward what is potentially al-Qaida‘s most dangerous form of indirect influence: ideological inspiration of independent acts of terror.

8.0 ASSESSING THE THREAT THAT TERRORISTS WITH NON-FUNCTIONAL TIES TO AL-QAIDA POSE TO THE AMERICAN MILITARY AT HOME

The sheer breadth of Islamist extremism as an ideological phenomenon makes bounding an inquiry into al-Qaida's inspirational role exceptionally challenging. Rather than selecting cases using random choice or following the worryingly common practice of opportunity sampling, which implicitly assumes that the cases about which the most is known accurately represent an otherwise clandestine phenomenon, this chapter ensured fair cross-comparison by employing additional theoretical constraints. Specifically, it examines only those events that (1) took place within the United States, and (2) targeted U.S. military personnel. The cases that emerge within the period under study[1] are the 2007 plot against Fort Dix in New Jersey, the 2009 shooting at an Army recruiting station in Little Rock, Arkansas, and the 2009 shootings at Fort Hood in Texas.

With the obvious caveat that the generalizability of this assessment may not extend beyond al-Qaida's role in attacking service members stationed in the American homeland, these cases suggest that although events with weak non-functional ties to al-Qaida remain of concern, both the threat that they pose and their connections to bin Laden's organization are typically exaggerated. The oft-cited influence of online jihadist propaganda remains an important factor in the radicalization process and accounts many of these plots' diffuse, non-functional connections to al-Qaida, but the consumption of Internet propaganda seems to harden radical viewpoints, rather than causing them, because the evidence suggests that Islamists typically begin viewing extremist web pages after adopting jihadists' creed. This analysis posits that first-person social interactions with existing extremists, who often lack meaningful connections to al-Qaida, likely play the greatest role in triggering radicalization. Given the small sample size employed by this chapter, the results require additional research to validate, but these findings generally support previous findings regarding the sociological nature of radical indoctrination,[2] while suggesting that theories which posit the existence of a direct causal relationship between the viewing of online propaganda and participation in violent jihad require amendment.[3]

[1] As this analysis considers attacks that took place before the end of 2010, a 2011 bomb-plot by Jason Naser Abdo, an AWOL soldier who also sought to target Fort Hood, falls outside of the this study by a year. For an outline of the events involving Naser Abdo, see: Peter Finn and Alice Fordham, "Naser Abdo, AWOL soldier, charged in Fort Hood bomb plot," Washington Post, July 29, 2011; available online: http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/national-security/awol-soldier-naser-abdo-charged-in-fort-hood-bomb-plot/2011/07/29/gIQAFKAUhI_story.html.

Four sections follow this introduction; each of the first three discusses one of the cases listed above, before the fourth offers some broader theoretical conclusions. Broadly speaking, the topical sections also follow the same now-familiar internal structure used in previous chapters and include sub-sections that discuss: the nature and extent of planning that took place prior to the event's execution (or attempted execution); the logistical and financial support that the event received; and the nature and extent of the plotters' training. However, this chapter's explicit focus on ideology requires a slight deviation from the standard format. Each section also includes a break-out that provides detailed background information on the plotters in order to establish their state-of-mind prior to participation in terrorism, as well as a break-out that examines how the plotters‘ ideological views changed during the radicalization process. Finally, each section closes with a brief comparative summation.

8.1 THE FORT DIX SIX

In early May 2007, the Department of Justice announced the arrest of six men in relation to a plot against Fort Dix, an Army installation southwest of Trenton, New Jersey. Five of the men plotted ―to kill as many soldiers as possible in an armed assault" on the post, and the sixth supplied them with illegal weapons.[4] From the very beginning, it was clear that the men operated in isolation, without the benefit of operational or logistical support from al-Qaida or any other Islamist terror group. They attempted to prepare for the attack by self-training and attempted to use personal connections to fulfill their need for weapons. Consequently, the plotters‘ efforts were amateurish unrealistic. Their only connection to al-Qaida, or, for that matter, any other established terror group, came via the Internet. The plotters were avid viewers of online jihadist videos, but this propaganda seems to have played only a secondary role in the plotter‘s indoctrination. First-person interactions, both among the group‘s members and with existing extremists from outside the group, seem to have played the larger role in their radicalization.

8.1.1 BACKGROUND

In January 2006, the investigation into the Fort Dix plot began in an unusual location: a Circuit City in Mt. Laurel, New Jersey. A young clerk named Brian Morganstern viewed some worrying footage in the process of converting a customer‘s hand-shot 8mm film to DVD. The tape showed a group of young men dressed in fatigues, who fired pistols and semi-automatic rifles as they conversed excitedly in a language that Morganstern did not recognize (it turned out to be Albanian). When the clerk picked-out words like "jihad" and "Allahu akbar," he became concerned and brought the tape to the attention of local police, who in turn informed the FBI.[5] A federal investigation ensued; it soon began to center on group of immigrant men in their 20s, many of whom had been friends since attending high-school together in Cherry Hill, a New Jersey community just out Philadelphia.

Three of the men on the tape were brothers. Dritan, Eljvir, and Shain Duka had come to America from the former Yugoslavia as toddlers. In October 1984, when Dritan was 5, Eljvir was 3, and baby-brother Shain was barely 1, the family entered the US illegally through Mexico and settled briefly in Texas. However, the Dukas were destined for the New York area, where dozens of members of their large extended family resided. They spent enough in Brooklyn's ethnic Albanian community for the brothers to pick-up New York accents, before moving to New Jersey when the boys were in their teens.[6]

After the move, the younger two brothers attended Cherry Hill West High School. Their ties to two of the other Fort Dix plotters likely date to this period, because Eljvir and Shain's time at Cherry Hill West overlapped with the enrollment of Mohamad Shnewer, a Jordanian immigrant whose family ran a local convenience store, and Serdar Tatar, a Turkish immigrant whose father ran a pizza shop near Fort Dix.[7] Like the Duka brothers, Shnewer and Tatar spent the bulk of their lives in the U.S. Shnewer's family had immigrated in 1987, when he was 2,[8] and Tatar's family had come to the country in 1992, when he was about 9.[9]

Argon Abdullahu, the logistical supporter arrested in connection with the Fort Dix plot, also had a relationship with the Dukas that dated to his teens. Another ethnic Albanian born in the former Yugoslavia, Abdullahu had immigrated as a refugee from Kosovo in 1999, when he was 16 years old. It is unclear whether or not he attended Cherry Hill West, but Abdullahu developed a friendship with the Dukas during the course of pick-up games of basketball and soccer.[10] The fact that all of the boys spoke Albanian could not have hurt their relationship.

8.1.2 RADICALIZATION

Information on the radicalization of the Fort Dix plotters is somewhat vague, but the available data suggests that it was a gradual process that began sometime after the plotters left high school. Indeed, the Duka brothers were anything but radical when they arrived in New Jersey. They seemed to work hard at assimilating. Dritan once played a small role in an episode of Law and Order; Eljvir acted in a rock video, and Shain appeared in a commercial for the World Wrestling Federation.[11] It seems that the boys were somewhat obsessed with being as American as possible.

This pattern continued when the two younger Dukas entered Cherry Hill West. Eljvir went by the name "Elvis" in high school, and the brothers were regulars at the keg parties that broke-out whenever anyone's parents left town. The Dukas were also avid basketball fans, and although they did not play on the school's varsity team, they regularly participated in pick-up games in local parks. They also tried to promote themselves as Brooklyn tough-guys, rather than

Islamist radicals, by telling fanciful stories about street-fighting during their time in New York. Thus, like many teens—especially those in Jersey—the Dukas spent their childhood trying to look cool.[12]

Little is known about the remaining plotters' early views on radical Islam, but nothing suggests that they were born into extremism. The Shnewer family's convenience store doubled as a halal butcher shop,[13] so it seems likely that the family was at least moderately devout, but Shnewer followed Islamic guidelines only selectively in his day-to-day life. He refused to eat foods that came into contact with pork, but while working at a local restaurant, he served alcohol to customers and did not break from work to pray.[14] Tartar's background was even more secular; his father self-described as "not a religious person" and later openly chastised his son for making religion the focal point of his life.[15]

As for Abdullahu, a great deal of mystery surrounds his background. The Duka brothers believed he had served as a sniper in the Kosovo conflict,[16] suggesting that he held radical views even before he immigrated to the United States. However, given that Abdullahu was only 16 at the time of his arrival in New Jersey, he would have been only 14 or 15 when the Kosovo conflict broke-out in 1998.[17] It is not impossible that he was an exceptionally youthful sniper, but it seems somewhat unlikely. Moreover, Abdullahu's attorney later vociferously and categorically denied that his client was ever a belligerent in the Kosovo conflict.[18] In all likelihood, the Dukas believed a fiction put forth by a teenage boy trying desperately to fit into an unfamiliar environment by impressing his new friends with tall-tales of military glory. As additional information discussed in relation to the plot's logistics will make clearer, there is scant evidence to suggest that Abdullahu was ever a radical Muslim, even during the course of his involvement in the Fort Dix plot, and though likely not a sniper, he was apparently a life-long gun enthusiast.

Meanwhile, the Dukas' indoctrination into radical Islam seems to have begun at home. Members of New York's Albanian community, of which the Duka family was part, claim that one of the brothers' uncles became radicalized while serving prison time in the early 1990s and passed his new views onto his nephews.[19] Thereafter, the brothers became more outwardly devout. In the years after high school, they stopped drinking; they grew beards; they began attending mosque regularly.[20] In religious ceremonies not sanctioned by the state, Eljvir and Dritain married 15 year-old brides. Eljvir's wife was one of Shnewer's five sisters; Dritain's was an American-born convert to Islam.[21] Religion had become the focus of the brothers' lives.

A concomitant change took place in Tatar and Shnewer, as rifts developed between the young men and their respective families. Tatar's father attributed his son's radicalism to the Duka's influence. When his son brought one of the brothers by the pizzeria that the Tatar family owned and operated, Tatar's father told him "I don't like this kid. I don't want you together."[22] But Tatar ignored his father; he continued to associate with the Dukas and was soon beyond his family‘s control. In 2005, his father‘s persistent criticism of his burgeoning religious views caused Tatar quit the pizza shop, where he had worked as a driver making frequent deliveries to Fort Dix. He moved to nearby Philadelphia and began working at a 7-Eleven franchise, but according to the Russian-born Muslim convert that Tatar married shortly after the move, he attended the mosque only infrequently.[23] Thus, it seems that once separated from the Dukas by geography, Tatar‘s radicalism may have waned.

The evidence is unclear, but Shnewer seems to have travelled a similar path to fundamentalism, and it is likely that the Dukas played a role in the transformation. Shnewer‘s family portrays him as immature and impressionable. Even after graduating high school, he apparently favored children‘s programing on the Nickelodeon network and spent long hours playing video games. His mother stated he was ―like a baby.”[24] In combination with Shnewer‘s affinity bonds to the Dukas, which date to high school, and his familial ties to the brothers, which stem from Eljvir‘s marriage to Shnewer‘s teenage sister, these characterizations suggest that Shnewer was likely influenced by the brothers‘ worldview. Though the argument is speculative, network effects offer a moderately-compelling explanation for Shnewer‘s radicalization.

The timing of Shewer‘s radicalization is, however, clearer. After graduating from Cherry Hill West in 2003, he enrolled in classes at a nearby Camden Community College and continued to work in the family‘s store. But he soon dropped out of school, ostensibly so that he could work more in order to help the family pay a pair of burdensome mortgages. Although he continued to live at home until his arrest, Shnewer‘s relationship with his father became increasingly strained and rather than continuing to work in the family business, Shnewer began driving a cab at nights in nearby Philadelphia.[25] According to his mother, Shnewer did little besides work, sleep, and pray in the year preceding his arrest.[26] Family friends began describing Shnewer as ―lost," and his father complained that ―in this country, you can't tell your own son what to do."[27] Thus, by 2006, Shnewer had, like Tatar, shed his family's values.

[23] Ibid.
[24] Quoted in Ripley.

The evidence suggests that from this point forward the five key plotters' views on radicalism co-evolved, as the men fed off of each other's beliefs, but the now radicalized Shnewer seems to have taken the lead. The authorities were ideally positioned to document this evolution, because a pair of informants witnessed the plotters' ideological hardening first-hand. In March 2006, Mahmoud Omar, an Egyptian immigrant who worked as a car salesman and once served time on charges of bank fraud, began hanging around the Shnewer family's shop at the bureau's direction. He seemed lonely and made conversation with anyone who would listen. Although he was in his 30s, he soon made friends with the 22 year-old Shnewer, who in turn introduced Omar to Tatar and the Dukas. The six often discussed politics and religion as they shot pool together.[28]

By late April, Shnewer trusted Omar enough to initiate a conversation about ―something that can lead to prison" and began to discuss terrorism in detail.[29] Moreover, the young taxi driver shared his large collection of jihadist videos, which he had downloaded to his laptop, with the informant. According to federal documents, the clips included the video wills of two of the 9/11 hijackers and ―images of Osama Bin Laden and other Islamic extremists making various speeches in which the speakers call the viewer to join the jihadist movement."[30]

Similarly, in July, the plotters screened jihadist videos for Besnik Bakalli, an Albanian immigrant in his mid-30s, who served as the FBI's second informant and gained entry into the group on the pretense that he was a recently-divorced man with a violent past and a desire to martyr himself in a suicide-bombing.[31] Wearing grins so pronounced as to merit mention in the FBI's official complaint, Shnewer and the Dukas showed Bakalli footage of insurgent attacks on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.[32]

These interactions took place several months after the 'training' video first brought the Fort Dix plotters to the authorities' attention. Although it is not known precisely when the men began downloading their collection of videos, the plotters first documented (virtual) ideological ties to al-Qaida took place after the plotters were already demonstrably radicalized. In light of the Dukas' reported interactions with their fundamentalist ex-convict uncle and Tatar's father's description of the brothers' role in his son's ideological transformation, it seems likely that the plotters began to watch jihadist videos because they were already fans of violence in the name of Islam. Thus, al-Qaida's propaganda may have helped to maintain and harden the plotters' views, but casual arguments suggesting that videos triggered the plotters' extremism seem exaggerative.

8.1.3 PLANNING

As August 2007 dawned, the plotters began to conceptualize how to implement their conception of violent Islam at a local level. Shnewer took the lead in planning, but from the very beginning, the plotters' aspirations far outstripped their capabilities and resources. The plot that ultimately took shape was amateurish and probably would not have caused much in the way of damage if it had been implemented before the authorities disrupted the attempt at jihad.

Shnewer selected Fort Dix as a target because he believed that Tatar knew the post ~~like~~ the palm of his hand" from delivering pizzas to quarters housing.[33] This inside knowledge would allow the team to find ~~a~~areas where there are 100-200 individuals," which teams of ~~6~~-7 persons" could attack using mortars, automatic rifles, and Rocket Propelled Grenades (RPGs).[34] In Shnewer's vision, the Dukas would finance the attack, because Eljvir and Dritan had ~~a~~ lot of money,"[35] presumably from the roofing business that they ran out of Eljvir's home,[36] but Shnewer also planned to contribute and had ~~b~~een saving money for this plan for some time."[37]

However, Shnewer also considered targets other than Fort Dix and conducted some preliminary surveillance of these targets. In August, with the informant Omar in tow, Shnewer made trips to an army installation at Fort Monmouth, New Jersey; an Air Force Base in Dover, Delaware; and a Coast Guard building in Philadelphia. Fort Dix ultimately won-out over these other possible targets in late November 2006, when Tatar swiped a delivery map of the post from his father's pizzeria.

This action represented Tatar's first meaningful commitment to the Fort Dix endeavor. He had participated in the early pool-hall discussions of religion and politics, but of the five key participants, he displayed the least outward commitment to jihad and had not been part of the earlier screening of jihadist videos. Tatar was clearly on the fence regarding his participation in terrorism, because just a few days before turning the map over to Shnewer, Tatar contacted the Philadelphia Police Department and reported to detectives that ~~h~~e had been approached by an individual who had pressured him to acquire maps of Fort Dix."[38] He was even explicit that he ~~–w~~as fearful that the incident was terrorism-related."[39] Although the police placed a phone call to the FBI in Tatar's presence, the incident somehow galvanized young Turkish immigrant's commitment to the plot, and he took the only documented planning action that was not initiated by Shnewer by providing the map to his co-conspirators. However, it remains unclear why Tatar believed that it was safe to proceed after alerting authorities to the broad outlines of the plot.

8.1.4 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Questions of the teams' planning skills aside, weapons were a bit of a problem. As Shnewer told one of the informants during a recorded conversation, the team would have to purchase weapons ~~–f~~rom the street as you cannot buy a machine gun from a store."[40] The Dukas took the lead on overcoming this logistical hurdle. In mid-August, Bakalli recorded a conversation with Dritain, Eljvir, and Shain, in which the eldest Duka brother stated that he was in search of two or three fully-automatic Kalishnikovs. By December 2006, the brothers had acquired a magnum .357 revolver, a shotgun, and ~~–a~~ small automatic weapon" on the black market. By January, the team's arsenal had grown to include a 9mm handgun and a semi-automatic assault rifle.[41]

Many of these weapons, as well as a supply of ammunition, were provided by Abdullahu, who simply lent the team some items from the gun cabinet he kept at home. Because the Dukas were all undocumented aliens, they were incapable of legally purchasing arms and had to rely on loans and straw purchases to acquire items that they could not find (or perhaps could not afford) on the black market.[42] At first blush, Abdullahu's role in these acquisitions suggests that he was a key participant in the Fort Dix plot. However, he did not attend any of the planning meetings and seems to have become involved only out of a sense of obligation to the Dukas. Abdullahu was clearly aware of his friends' statements about the necessity of jihad, but ultimately dismissed their tough talk as idle boasting—a decision that seems rash in retrospect, but which probably made a great deal of sense given that he and the Dukas had a long history of sharing exaggerated stories in a bid to impress one another. Therefore, Abdullah seems to have been a somewhat unwitting (and somewhat foolish) accomplice, rather than a dedicated member of the attack-team.

[39] Ibid.
[40] Ibid.

Unsatisfied with the quantity of arms that Abdullahu could provide, the Dukas continued their efforts to acquire weapons right up until their arrest. The manner in which they went about the process says a great deal about the team's capabilities or, more aptly, lack thereof. During a chance encounter at a convenience store, the brothers happened upon an FBI agent who had been part of a surveillance team that watched the plotters as they shot targets at a gun range. The Dukas immediately recognized the man, and instead of being spooked by the encounter, assumed that the agent was a gun enthusiast and asked him for help in acquiring automatic weapons.[43]

Specifically, they wanted to buy Russian-made AK-47s, because they believed these weapons to be superior to the Chinese-made model. Dritan later attempted to buy a Kalishnakov from a man in Camden, New Jersey, but backed-out of the deal at the last minute because he believed the seller was a federal agent. It remains unclear if this event stemmed from convenience store run-in, but in mid-March Dritan made another attempt to purchase heavier weaponry, including RPGs and M-16 automatic rifles, this time through a fictitious source that the informant Omar supposedly knew from his native Egypt. Clearly, the plotters wanted to acquire as much fire-power as they could; they simply had no realistic idea how to go about doing so.[44]

8.1.5 TRAINING

The team's training regimen fit the same amateurish patterns as the Duka's efforts toward weapons acquisition and consisted entirely of weekend trips to the Poconos and small-scale paintball games played in the New Jersey woods. The first of these outings, which sparked the investigation when footage of it made its way to Circuit City, took place months before Schnewer began to formulate a specific plan and may have been more of a recreational get-away than a dedicated training mission. In addition to the scene at the firing range, the tape showed the Dukas and their friends ―skiinghiking, and joking around."[45] Given the timing and context of this outing, it is difficult to argue that the first Pocono trip constituted meaningful preparation for jihad. The initial shooting session was probably less of a training tool and more a means to enable the plotters to become comfortable with the idea of an attack. Or, as the Dukas later claimed, it may have simply been vacation footage of young men who enjoyed shooting.[46]

In February 2007, the plotters made another trip that was a far clearer example of terror training. Absent Tatar, the plotters returned to the Poconos, with the informant Omar and Abdullahu in tow. They practiced shooting shotguns, small caliber rifles, and handguns at a state game land near Gouldsboro, Pennsylvania. Abduallahu played the role of firearms instructor; several of the other men were so inexperienced with guns that they did not even know how to properly shoulder a weapon. It remains unclear how much the men were able to learn, because Abduallahu left early. According to his rendition of events, he did so because he could not stomach his friends' persistent discussion of violence.[47]

[44] Ibid.
[45] Ripley.
[46] Ibid.

However, this outing also helped to reinforce the plotters' ideological commitment to jihad. Absent the early departing Abduallau, the remaining men spent the evenings engaged in group social activities that likely helped to desensitize the team to violence. Specifically, they "relaxed" by watching terror training and Islamist propaganda videos, and reportedly chuckled at the image of a Marine who lost his arm in an IED attack.[48]

The team's final training exercises before the arrest were truly hapless. In late February, Eljvir and Shain played paintball with the informant Omar in the woods near Eljvir's house. They played again in mid-March, around the same time that Dritan ordered the weapons, and this time included the Duka's pre-teen brother in the game. The FBI argues that the excursions constituted "tactical training,"[49] but this characterization seems overly ambitious. While a number of police and military units have used paintball to help simulate a live-fire experience,[50] it remains to be seen how games involving only three or four players, one of whom was a young boy, could have realistically prepared the plotters to ambush the groups of 100 to 200 soldiers specified in their original plan. At best, the games were confidence building measures that bolstered the Duka's morale, but, like most civilian paintball experiences, the games may have been little more than an exercise in fantasy.

8.1.6 SUMMATION

Ultimately, al-Qaida‘s role in inspiring the Fort Dix plot seems secondary. The jihadist videos that the plotters watched enthusiastically were certainly a contributing factor, but the direct influence that the Dukas‘ radicalized uncle exerted on his nephews seems to have been the trigger that pushed the brothers toward fundamentalism, and, in turn, their influence pushed the somewhat reluctant Tatar, and possibly also the impressionable and immature Shnewer, down the same path. Moreover, the plotters often viewed jihadist propaganda as a group, so it is difficult to separate the videos‘ influence from that of the social interactions that surrounded the viewing experience. In short, the Fort Dix plotters were largely self-radicalized as the result of reciprocal friendship ties, and al-Qaida‘s links to the plot were only of the most diffuse and indirect type imaginable.

While the plotters clearly desired to commit violence in the name of Islam, they lacked the resources and training necessary to act on this inspiration. None of the plotters had the contacts necessary to obtain the weapons that they needed to implement their plan. They borrowed weapons from a friend and relied on a fictitious supplier created by a government informant, who gave the plotters just enough rope to hang themselves through self-incrimination. Consequently, by the time of their arrests, they had acquired few guns, most of which were ill-suited to an armed assault because they had a low capacity for ammunition. Moreover, none of the available materials suggests that the plotters obtained the multiple magazines that would have been necessary to enable the sort of rapid reloading necessary to maintain a high enough rate of fire to meet their stated goal of killing a hundred or more troops. Given that the plotters‘ training consisted of a pair of trips to the Poconos and a pair of half-hearted paintball games, it seems that they lacked not only the materiel to implement Shnewer‘s plan, but also the necessary skills.

The plan itself was also far from perfect. Even with the map that Tatar provided, it remains unclear how the plotters could have accessed the post. Had they attempted to enter the installation on the pretense of a pizza delivery, as their plan suggested they might, they would likely have been discovered at the gate, because it is standard practice for the Army to search all visitors' vehicles, event those of familiar delivery people. Ultimately, the Fort Dix plotters were amateur terrorists, whose aspirations far outstripped their abilities.

However, this should not suggest that they were entirely harmless. Despite their difficulties in planning, logistics, and training, the Fort Dix plotters would likely have caused casualties, probably among the post's gate guards, if government efforts had not undermined their attack. The simple truth is that people are easy to kill, especially if the attacker is willing to die in the process. The point is that the Fort Dix plotters would never have met their original goals, not that they would have been unable to achieve some level of violence. Thus, despite the plotters' almost total incompetence, this case illustrates the inherent dangers of radical ideologies, because even the least capable terrorists can cause minor damage.

8.2 THE 2009 LITTLE ROCK SHOOTINGS: AL-QAIDA IN THE ARABIAN OZARKS?

Abdul Hakim Mujahid Muhammad, an African-American convert to Islam who was 24 years old at the time of his 2009 arrest, offers a case in point demonstrating the limited threat posed by incompetent jihadists. On June 1, police in Little Rock, Arkansas, responded to a 911 call. Shots had been fired at a U.S. Army Recruiting station. Two soldiers were down with multiple gunshot wounds; one man was dead and another was critically wounded.[51] Surviving witnesses described the assailant as "a black male, driving a black Ford Explorer Sport Track," and the officers on scene immediately broadcast this description on a city-wide alert.[52] A few miles away, near the Interstate, patrol officers conducted a felony stop on a vehicle matching the bulletin. The driver, Muhammad, surrendered without incident, but had a loaded revolver and a well-stocked ammunition belt on his person. Based on this evidence, Police obtained quickly obtained a search warrant for the vehicle, where they discovered additional ammunition, Molotov cocktails, and the assault rifle used in the shooting. At Muhammad's home, they found jihadist propaganda and materials used in the construction of crude liquid-based explosive devices.[53] In short, the police caught Muhammad red-handed.

When the case went to trial a few months later, he decided to plead guilty. In a letter to the presiding judge, Muhammad justified his actions as legitimate ~~a~~according to Islamic Laws and the Islamic Religion."[54] Moreover, he claimed to be ~~a~~ffiliated with Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula" and argued that the shooting ~~w~~as a Jihadi Attack [sic] on infidel forces. That didn't go as plan [sic]."[55] These claims implied that one of the few jihadist groups with ongoing active ties to the core of bin Laden's organization had used an American citizen to execute an attack on the American military in the middle of the American heartland.

However, the evidence suggests that Muhammad greatly exaggerated his ties to the global jihadist community. Despite unequivocally supporting militant ideology, Muhammad seems to have lacked meaningful operational, financial, or training ties to any violent Islamist group. Ultimately, the Little Rock shooting was the culmination of a poorly conceived, poorly executed campaign of terror conducted in isolation by a single man of questionable competency, who found Islamist ideology broadly appealing and would have fought on behalf of any Islamist terror group that would have taken him.

8.2.1 BACKGROUND

Muhammad was born Carlos Bledsoe in Memphis, Tennessee, and raised in a Baptist household, but his behavior in high school demonstrated that Muhammad was never particularly devout in his original faith. He received several suspensions from school for fighting, was a member of the M.O.B. gang,[56] and was arrested on at least one occasion for an incident involving brass knuckles.[57] However, he managed not only to graduate, but also to be accepted to college.

Muhammad spent a year and a half at Tennessee State, in Nashville, before a self-described ―two blunt a day" marijuana habit and pattern of binge drinking ended his scholastic career.[58] It seems that he may also have continued his involvement in gang violence during this period, because in 2004, police in Knoxville, Tennessee, arrested a 19 year-old Muhammad and three friends for possession of marijuana and possession of illegal weapons, including an SKS automatic rifle and a sawed-off shotgun. Muhammad's later statements to the press indicate that several of the weapons were intended for re-sale. After his conviction, he received a plea deal that stipulated he would receive 14 years in prison on the original charges if convicted of another crime, no matter how minor, so he endeavored to change his life.[59]

8.2.2 RADICALIZATION

Toward this goal of self-improvement, Muhammad began a process of religious exploration that set his path toward radicalism in motion. Although Islam ultimately proved to be his salvation from substance abuse and gang life, it was not the first religion he explored. He evaluated Christianity, but abandoned the religion of his birth because he found the concept of the holy trinity incomprehensible. He explored Orthodox Judaism, but felt that synagogues were excluding him because of his race. However, he found a warm welcome at a Nashville mosque, where according to Muhammad's later recollection, the ~~b~~brothers shouted _Allahu Akbar (god is great)" when he mentioned he might be interested in their religion and embraced him like he was a ~~l~~long lost brother."[60] Although the record does not speak to Muhammad's online habits at the time of these religious explorations, it seems fairly clear that first-person social interactions greatly shaped his religious destiny.

After formally converting to Islam in December 2004, Muhammad stopped using drugs and alcohol and began to study his new religion more seriously. His progression from convert to Islamist radical seems to have then proceeded over the course of a few years. After dropping out of college, he worked a series of menial jobs, including a yearlong stint as a bellman at the Opryland Hotel and a lengthy period as a temp assigned to various warehouses.[61] In 2007, a little over two years after his conversion, Muhammad, who had now legally changed his name to reflect his new faith,[62] packed-up and moved to Yemen to pursue Islamic studies. Though clearly devout at this point, his family alleges that he was not yet radical; just before departing for Yemen, Muhammad apparently told his sister not to worry because he was "not one of those Muslims."[63]

He spent more than two years abroad, supporting himself with a series of itinerant jobs teaching English, purportedly in camps for Afghan refugees, and married a local woman in February 2009.[64] About two months later, Yemeni authorities stopped him at a roadside checkpoint and arrested him because his travel documents were in disarray. Muhammad had no visa to be in the country and carried both a fake Somali passport, which he had acquired in hopes of joining forces with jihadist groups operating on the Horn of Africa, and his now-expired American passport.[65]

In short, the documents in Muhammad's possession at the time of his arrest demonstrate that he transformed from a hard-partying, gang-affiliated college drop-out to an aspiring mujahid within the span of five years. It is hardly a stretch to suggest that first-person contact with some of Yemen's more fundamentalist mosques helped to harden his ideological devotion to jihad, but, as the section on training discusses in more detail, it would be presumptive to assume that Muhammad had much, if any, direct contact with known violent extremists. It is, however, worth noting that Muhammad claims to have met several jihadists while briefly incarcerated in Yemeni prison after the passport dust-up.[66] If true, these assertions, which seem plausible, suggest that a man already suffering from the symptoms of Islamist radicalism may have been injected with one final shot of religious extremism before returning to the United States.

8.2.3 PLANNING

Yemeni authorities held Muhammad for about two and half months following his arrest, before deporting him back to the United States. According to his own account, he began to conceptualize his jihad during this detention. From the very beginning, he wanted to target "different Army recruiting centers and Jewish organizations" because of "what they're doing in Palestine . . . years of killing Muslims."[67] Muhammad envisioned a multi-city jihad that would target "Little Rock, Memphis, Nashville, Florence, KY, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and D.C."[68] However, he made no immediate efforts to implement this grand vision upon returning to the U.S. and instead spent about three months living quietly with his parents in Memphis, before moving to Little Rock in April to take a job with his father's tour-bus company.

Once in Arkansas, Muhammad did little more in the way of planning and nothing in the way of target-surveillance. The Army Recruiting Center in Little Rock was not his initial target; instead, Muhammad wanted to attack out-of-state. His sole planning activity consisted of a single online research session, during which he found the addresses of two targets: the home of an orthodox rabbi in Nashville, Tennessee, which he selected to retaliate for Israel's conduct in the Palestinian conflict; and an Army Recruiting Center in Florence, Kentucky, which he selected to get back at the United States for, in his own words, "pissing on the Koran."[69] He did, however, put a small amount of thought into tactical considerations and selected the Florence site over other potential targets because it was near an Interstate and the Ohio border, which Muhammad believed would facilitate his get-away by, respectively, enabling him to flee the scene rapidly and precluding any local law enforcement from crossing jurisdictional lines to follow him.[70]

8.2.4 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

Muhammad's materiel preparations for jihad began in earnest after his move to Arkansas. He used the meager earnings from his job to slowly acquire ammunition and second-hand weapons. He deliberately avoided retail purchases because he was concerned that the FBI might be tracking him, and he was likely knowledgeable about how to acquire guns on the black market from his involvement in illicit weapons sales during his time in the M.O.B. gang. However, shortly before the Little Rock shooting, Muhammad decided to buy a .22 caliber rifle over the counter from Walmart in order to test how closely the federal government was monitoring his movements. When he was able to walk out of the super-store unmolested, he decided he could proceed with an attack because "The FBI had not put a hold or checked."[71]

Given that his other weapon of choice was the Molotov cocktail, Muhammad's additional logistical needs, beyond his vehicle, were commonly available items: glass bottles, gasoline and oil to fill them, and cloth rags to serve as primitive wicks. Indeed, other than the purchase of guns, the greatest expense that Muhammad incurred during the course of the operation was the cost of the fuel that he burned by driving to designated attack sites out-of-state. After his capture, Muhammad would even lament that he might have been able to accomplish more, if gas had not been nearly four dollars per gallon.[72] Clearly, a jihadist who purchased small-caliber weapons from Walmart and worried about the cost of a tank of gasoline did not benefit from any outside financial or logistical support.

[70] Gray.
[71] Quoted in Gray.
[72] Gray.

8.2.5 TRAINING

Despite Muhammad's claim to have held some vague ties to violent Yemeni Islamist groups, his training was as haphazard as his planning and his logistical preparation. Muhammad claims that "people from the US embassy" interviewed him during his detention abroad, because he had "literature, contact, cell, videos, and people's numbers on [his] phone that were wanted in Saudi Arabia."[73] However, if Muhammad's contacts with jihadists were as significant as he claims, it seems unlikely that the government of Yemen, which human rights organizations have repeatedly accused of arbitrarily detaining and torturing terror suspects,[74] would have released Muhammad so swiftly, or that the U.S. government, which has prosecuted several other American citizens on conspiracy charges for receiving terror training abroad,[75] would have taken no legal action against him upon his return to American soil. It seems that Muhammad exaggerated the significance of his interactions with foreign extremists. Evidence irrefutably demonstrating that he had received any sort of formal training in Yemen or elsewhere would be truly surprising.

On the domestic side, Muhammad's only other training took place in the weeks immediately preceding the attack, when he shot targets at a handful of deserted construction sites near his home in Little Rock. Like his limited planning exercise, these practice sessions seem to have been solo affairs. There is absolutely no evidence that any organization or individual helped Muhammad to prepare for his jihad.[76] To be blunt: Muhammad's escapades made the Fort Dix plotters' training experience in the Poconos seem comparatively rigorous.

8.2.6 OPERATIONS

Given his almost complete lack of preparation and training, it is not surprising that Muhammad's efforts in jihad were ultimately haphazard and amateurish. Indeed, they were largely impromptu affairs. He did little more than mix a batch of Molotov cocktails and load his weapons into his vehicle before setting-off down the highway in pursuit of Islamic vengeance.[77]

Muhammad's first attempt at violence was to firebomb the rabbi's house in Nashville, but the attack, which took place just a few hours before the Little Rock shooting, was an utter failure. Because Muhammad had conducted no reconnaissance, he did not know that the home's windows were made of Plexiglas, so when he hurled a Molotov cocktail against one, the bomb bounced harmlessly into the yard without damaging the house. Muhammad hurried quickly from the scene in order to avoid capture and proceeded to his second pre-determined target, but his lack of preparation caught-up with him again in Kentucky. Muhammad was unable to stage an attack in Florence because the recruiting center was closed; the would-be terrorist had apparently neglected to determine the center's schedule of operation.[78]

Crestfallen, Muhammad returned home to Little Rock to plan for another attack, when, by happenstance, he spotted ~~–t~~wo guys in Army fatigues smoking" in a parking lot and decided on a spur-of-the-moment attack. Using tactics that echoed his gang background rather than time spent in a desert training camp, Muhammad drove casually through the parking lot, as if looking for a space, and used an SKS assault rifle to conduct a drive-by on the unsuspecting soldiers. He panicked in the get-away and got lost in some nearby road construction; police captured Muhammad before he even reached the Interstate.[79]

8.2.7 SUMMATION

Given Muhammad's near-continual incompetence, he paints the picture of an imitator who sought to replicate the sort of violence committed by well-known Islamist terror groups, rather than the AQAP-trained mujahid he claimed to be in his letter to the judge who presided over his criminal case. Muhammad's failed attempt to enter Somalia and his repeated claims of affiliation with prominent Middle Eastern terror groups demonstrate that he subscribed to a broadly defined Salafist ideology, but despite his best efforts, it seems he never made any significant end-roads into the terrorist community.

At best Muhammad's connections to established jihadists were vague, loose, and non-operational; at worst, these connections were entirely imagined. Indeed, Muhammad's father believed that his son made-up the AQAP connections in the hopes that they would anger the judge presiding over his case enough to impose the death penalty, thereby martyring the incompetent gunman.[80] Regardless of any relationships that Muhammad formed in Yemen, it is clear that he did not benefit from formal training, outside financial assistance, or any sort of logistical support in the immediate run-up to the attacks. Muhammad also conducted the little planning that preceded the attack on his own.

As no information is available on his Internet activity, it is impossible to assess the role that online propaganda may have played in his early indoctrination, but it seems clear that his first-hand experience at the Nashville mosque brought him into Islam, while his first-hand experience living in fundamentalist-influenced Yemen hardened Muhammad's ideology.

Though the difference may be excessively fussy, he is, therefore, most aptly characterized as a homegrown AQAP-inspired terrorist, rather than a homegrown al-Qaida inspired terrorist. But regardless of how observers choose to classify Muhammad's organizational aspirations, his ineptitude should dominate any descriptions.

Ultimately, Muhammad's case demonstrates just how easy it is to conduct rudimentary terror attacks. Working in isolation, a man who forensic psychiatrists would later describe as ~~"at~~ the low end of the Average range of intelligence" was able to attempt three separate attacks in the course of a single day.[81] Two of them failed completely, and the third caused few casualties. However, the shooting in Little Rock still killed one American serviceman and severely wounded another. Had Muhammad been even passably competent as a terrorist, he could have inflicted substantial loss of life and damage to property.

Despite Muhammad's failings, it seems clear in retrospect that federal law enforcement erred in its treatment of him, because events demonstrate that the young deportee should have been placed under the type of surveillance that he feared after returning from Yemen. Muhammad's specific attack was likely preventable, but other such rudimentary assaults are not, because few members of the radicalized Muslim community are likely to pass through similar deportation controls. So long as American society remains open, radical ideologies will continue to constitute a diffuse security threat, because Muhammad's peers need not have any operational, financial, logistical, or training ties to organizations like al-Qaida, nor any particular aptitude for planning or familiarity with the arts of war, in order to take-up arms in furtherance of their perception of the Islamist cause. While the Fort Dix plotters' amateurish efforts toward jihad and Muhammad's bumbling attacks both suggest that the scale of this threat is almost negligible, the final case in this chapter demonstrates that individuals with loose, non-operational connections to existing jihadist groups can cause moderate damage if they are competent in their planning and preparation.

8.3 THE 2009 FORT HOOD SHOOTING

On November 5, 2009, Nidal Malik Hasan, an Army major and a medical doctor specializing in psychiatry, shot and killed 13 people and wounded another 32. Most of his victims were fellow soldiers. Like Muhammad, Hasan acted alone, without the benefit of outside logistical, financial, training, or planning support. Also like Muhammad, Hasan held ideological ties to AQAP. Although many of these interactions involved online activity, Hasan's interactions with foreign Islamists were both more detailed and more personal than the online activities of the Fort Dix plotters. Specifically, he exchanged emails with Anwar al-Awlaki, a Yemeni-American cleric who served as AQAP's mouthpiece until his death in 2011.[82] While these exchanges demonstrate that the Internet figured prominently in Hasan's connections to the broader jihadist movement, the full context of his ideological history suggests that even in this case, first-person social interactions played the larger role in radicalization.

8.3.1 BACKGROUND

The evidence suggests that Hasan spent his childhood in a largely secular household, rather than a hotbed of Islamist sentiment. In 1970, Hasan was born in Alexandria, Virginia, to Muslim parents who made their living as restaurateurs after immigrating to the United States from a small Palestinian town outside Jerusalem. By the time Hasan entered high school in the mid-1980s, his parents owned and operated the Capitol Restaurant, a greasy spoon in Roanoke, Virginia, that the local paper remembered fondly as "a blue-collar beer hall" where "patrons enjoyed greasy blue-plate specials and sipped on Old Milwaukees in the worn wooden booths while a jukebox played Motown."[83] The family later parlayed the success of the Capitol into a series of other ventures, including a hot dog stand, a grocery, and a Mediterranean-themed restaurant known for its selection of imported beers. The local Imam does not remember the Hasans, suggesting that they attended the mosque infrequently, and Nidal lacked fluency in Arabic, suggesting that the family spoke English even at home. In combination with the family's consistent willingness to profit from alcohol, it seems clear that Hasan was raised in a household that emphasized assimilation and material success more than strict Koranic values.[84]

If Hasan held any radical views that diverged from the values suggested by his parents' behavior, they remained well-disguised behind a veil of anonymity throughout his youth. His high school classmates remember him as bright and laid-back, but not particularly involved. Hasan took advanced placement classes, but did not participate in any clubs or sports. Against the wishes of his parents, he enlisted in the Army immediately after graduating in 1988, and then underwent basic training at Fort Sam Houston, in Texas, before landing at Fort Irwin, in San Bernardino County, California, and enrolling part time at nearby Barstow Community College. Hasan made no impressions, positively or negatively, on the school's faculty; his transcripts show that he made high grades, but none of the teachers still on staff at the time of Hasan's 2009 shooting remembered him.[85]

In 1990, Hasan, who was still in uniform, moved back to Roanoke, presumably to be close to his family, and transferred to Virginia Western Community College. He continued his pattern of anonymity and scholastic achievement, graduating summa cum laude with an Associate's Degree in science in 1992, but failing to make a lasting impression on anyone at the school. Hasan then advanced to Virginia Tech, where in 1995, he earned a Bachelor's of Science in biochemistry, graduating with honors, but again failing to participate in any activities outside the classroom. In short, Hasan was not an Islamist firebrand in his youth; instead, the future terrorist was a bookworm who blended quietly into the background.[86]

8.3.2 RADICALIZATION

Hasan's extremism began to manifest publically in the early 2000s, during his medical residency. In 1997, he received an officer's commission, and based on the strength of his earlier academic achievements, the Army decided to send him to medical school at the highly-selective Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences (USUHS), in Bethesda, Maryland. When Hasan graduated in 2003, he began an internship in Psychiatry at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and according to statements that a fellow intern made to investigators after the shooting, "Hasan openly questioned whether he could engage in combat against other Muslims" during the early part of this program.[87] One of his supervisors became so concerned about Hasan's views that he attempted to convince the young doctor to leave the military on two different occasions during his third year in the program, bluntly telling Hasan that he should "just say goodbye" because he and the military just did not fit. The same officer even helped Hasan to explore

See also, Mark Owczarski, "Nidal Malik Hasan's Connection with Virginia Tech," Virginia Tech News, November 6, 2009. As the Owczarski account is based on Virginia Tech's in-house records, it seems to offer the most authoritative account of Hasan's academic progression and areas of study. Other accounts list Hasan's year of graduation as 1992 and claim that he studied engineering, rather than biochemistry. See, for example, Joseph I. Lieberman (Chairman) and Susan M. Collins (Ranking Member), "A Ticking Time Bomb: Counterterrorism Lessons From the U.S. Government's Failure to Prevent the Fort Hood Attack," U.S. Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, Washington, D.C., February 2011. (Hereafter "A Ticking Time Bomb").

whether or not he qualified for conscientious objector status, but this effort to find a back-door out of the military failed.[88]

Then, in 2006, during the final year of Hasan's residency at Walter Reed, his radicalism reached alarming levels during his presentation at "Grand Rounds," a formal meeting at which residents must present a detailed scholarly talk on a psychiatric issue in order to graduate. Hasan's presentation consisted of little more than Koranic references and did not cite any medical or psychological literature.[89] Among the more worrying aspects of the presentation was Hasan's emphasis on the idea of Abrogation, a theological perspective that Islamists use to ignore inconvenient portions of the Koran by arguing that the Prophet Mohammed's later revelations supersede earlier teachings.[90] Consequently, Hasan concluded that "peaceful verses [of the Koran] no longer apply,"[91] and "Fighting to establish an Islamic State to please God, even by force, is condoned by the Islam."[92] Hasan's supervisors forced some revisions, yet owning to a lack of established academic criteria for evaluating Grand Rounds presentations and amid concerns that failing a Muslim might be perceived as politically incorrect, the review committee ultimately signed-off on this non-clinical project and pushed the budding extremist through the program.[93]

After graduating from his residency, Hasan received a post-doctoral fellowship at USUHS, during which he exhibited behavior that demonstrated that his extremist views had solidified. He applied for the position in order to avoid a combat deployment to a Muslim country, and was accepted for the worst of reasons: Hasan was the only Army applicant for the position, and the program's director was concerned that leaving the fellowship vacant would result in its elimination the following year. Thus, Hasan's advancement said more about bureaucratic politics within the Army than it did about his promise as a mental health professional.

Indeed, Hasan seemed more concerned with advancing Islamist theology than providing psychiatric care. According to Hasan's co-fellows, who were officers drawn from other branches of the military, he displayed "fixed radical beliefs about fundamentalist Islam" and shared them "at every possible opportunity."[94] For example, during an August 2007 meeting, Hasan gave a presentation which argued that "U.S. Military operations are a war against Islam rather than based on non-religious security considerations."[95] Audience members were so offended that they broke the norms of academic politeness and shouted their objections at the podium, forcing the moderator of the panel to stop the presentation two minutes after it began.

Rather than an isolated incident, this presentation was indicative of broader patterns. In another classroom setting, Hasan argued in defense of suicide-bombers and stated that his faith as a Muslim took precedence over the patriotic oaths that he swore as an Army officer. Finally, in June 2008, Hasan began a research project, which he couched in more clinical language than his previous 'studies,' that sought to measure the extent of Islamist sympathies among Muslim soldiers. The project included a survey that a Senate investigation later described as "slanted to favor the violent Islamist extremist views that he had previously expressed," and in an ominous foreshadowing of events to come, Hasan listed concerns over "fratricide by Muslim-American servicememebers [sic]" as his project's central motivation.[96] In short, Hasan was no longer the quiet, studious young man that he had been when he graduated from Virginia Tech. By 2007, he had become a dedicated Islamist who believed that his religious beliefs trumped all other obligations.

What caused Hasan to change so drastically? The available evidence suggests that a combination of innate susceptibility and traumatic personal losses made Hasan uniquely vulnerable to radical influences. According to family members, Hasan was deeply sensitive. His uncle recounted that Hasan once tried to save a baby bird, by placing it in his mouth so that it could eat pre-masticated food, and that when his efforts failed, Hasan ~~m~~ourned for two or three months, dug a grave for it (the bird) and visited it."[97] Similarly, Hasan chose psychiatry as his medical specialty because he had difficulty with the sight of blood, and actually fainted the first time he observed child birth as a medical student.[98] Thus, it seems that Hasan was ill-equipped to deal with emotional trauma.

However, he received a pair of crippling emotional blows during medical school. In 1998, Hasan's father died of a massive heart attack at age 52, and in 2001, his mother, only age 49, followed her husband into the grave.[99] Hasan turned to the Koran for comfort and delved into books on Islam instead of interacting with friends.[100] Islam is not inherently violent, so Hasan's renewed interest in his religion did not necessarily presage his involvement in terrorist violence; instead, chance intervened by placing the Army officer in contact with a radical preacher during a period of increased emotional vulnerability.

Anwar al-Awlaki, the Yemeni-American preacher who later gained fame as an AQAP ideologue, came to northern Virginia in January 2001, and assumed the position of Imam at the Dar al-Hijra Mosque in Falls Church, where Hasan often worshipped. By that time, al-Awlaki had already begun to preach interpretations that appealed to Islamists. Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mihdhar, two of the terrorists onboard American Airlines Flight 77 when it crashed into the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, had frequented al-Awlaki's sermons during their brief stint in San Diego in early 2000, when the preacher still worked at the Rabat Mosque in the city's near-suburbs. Similarly, in March of 2001, al-Hazmi, who was now located on the east coast, began to attend services at Dar al-Hijra and brought with him Hani Hanjour, another of the Pentagon-bound hijackers.[101] Although the FBI doubts that al-Awlaki had direct knowledge of the 9/11 attacks,[102] the preacher's repeated interactions with the hijackers suggest that his beliefs were already ideologically congruent with al-Qaida's worldview. Therefore, it seems safe to assume that Hasan came in direct, first-person contact with radical ideology when al-Awlaki presided over the funeral services of the Army officer's mother in 2001.[103] Ultimately, the evidence suggests that fate created a perfect storm that initiated Hasan's radicalism by placing the exceptionally sensitive and increasingly devout Army officer in contact with an influential radical ideologue during a period of extreme emotional crisis.

The first-person interactions that Hasan had with soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan in his capacity as an Army psychiatrist then cemented the views that al-Awlaki had planted. According to family members, Hasan was "mortified" by the stories of violence against Muslims that traumatized soldiers recounted during clinical sessions.[104] One fellow officer at Fort Hood, where Hasan was posted after completing his USUHS fellowship in 2008, claimed that the doctor even petitioned the Army to prosecute some of his patients for war crimes based on revelations they made during confidential counseling sessions.[105] Even if such claims are exaggerated, it seems clear that Hasan's job afforded him the opportunity to cherry-pick and re-interpret evidence that supported the biased vision of American-Muslim relations that al-Awlaki previously helped to instill.

Moreover, al-Awlaki continued to wield influence over Hasan via the Internet, but the preacher followed a circuitous route to online prominence. Spooked by an FBI inquiry into his activities that followed in the wake of 9/11, al-Awlaki fled the US for London in 2002. In Britain, he conducted a series of lectures for crowds of young Muslims, but without any viable means of financial self-support in Britain, al-Awlaki returned to his ancestral home of Yemen in 2004, and began lecturing at al-Imam University, a radical Sunni institution headed by Abdul-Majid al-Zindani, a cleric who appears on U.S. terrorist sanctioning lists and who once tutored the "American Taliban," John Walker Lindh. Beginning in 2006, al-Awlaki spent 18 months in a Yemeni prison in connection with a plot to kidnap an American military attaché. When he emerged, he hid among his tribe, the Awaliq, and began distributing his radical message using a wide range of media, including audio CDs, booklets, and a worryingly popular Facebook page. By the time that Hasan neared completion of his USUHS fellowship, al-Awlaki had become one of the violent Islamist movement's most prominent spokesmen, in no small part because he frequently disseminated his message in English, thereby making it accessible to non-Arabic speakers like Hasan.[106]

The timeline of Hasan's actions suggest that the Army doctor was an avid reader of al-Awlaki's online posts. For example, in early December 2008, al-Awlaki issued a statement condemning any Muslim who would seek a religious ruling "that would allow him to serve in the armies of the disbelievers and fight against his brothers."[107] Hasan emailed the radical cleric a few days later. It was the pair's first known contact since their shared time in the D.C. area, but over the next six months Hasan and al-Awlaki traded an additional 17 messages. In one of the most worrying, Hassan alluded to his intent to conduct a suicide-attack, telling al-Awlaki that "he couldn't wait to join him in the discussions they would have over non-alcoholic wine in the afterlife."[108] Then, in mid-July 2009, al-Awlaki offered a harsh rebuke to Muslim soldiers serving in the American military in an online post stating that "the blame should be placed on the soldier who is willing to follow orders . . . who sells his religion for a few dollars."[109] Two weeks later, Hasan purchased the handgun he used in the Fort Hood shooting.

Ultimately, Hasan's path to radicalism did traverse the Internet, but as with the Fort Dix plotters, his online radical ties seem to have taken place after he already subscribed to a militant interpretation of Islam. His first-person interactions with al-Awlaki and then with battle-fatigued psychiatric patients fostered and cemented Hasan's belief system, before al-Awlaki's online posts and email messages gave it a more specific shape. While Hasan's history demonstrates that he had direct contact with radical Islam, it is necessary to close this section with an important clarification regarding the extent of Hasan's ties to known terrorists: The evidence has demonstrated only that he attended the same mosque as two of the 9/11 hijackers, not that he ever had any direct interactions with them. Hasan's ideological relationship with al-Awlaki constituted the Army major's only demonstrable interactions with an established jihadist.

8.3.3 PLANNING

While the timing of Hasan's actions relative to al-Awlaki's published statements suggests that the Army major unquestioningly followed the cleric's broad decrees, it remains to be seen that al-Awlaki provided any specific guidance regarding the conduct of the Fort Hood shooting. However, it is difficult to have complete confidence in this assessment, as the full contents of the pairs' email exchanges have never been publically released. Therefore, with this caveat, it seems that Hasan planned the operation in isolation, and, based on the timing of al-Awlaki's polemic against Muslims serving in the American military, that Hasan first began to conceive of the operation sometime in mid-July, about two and a half months before the shooting took place.

It is difficult, and perhaps even unnecessary, to assess any specific reconnaissance that Hasan conducted on the attack-site between this mid-summer inspiration and the date of the shooting in early November, because his was an insider attack. He clearly knew the location exceptionally well. The shooting took place at an Army processing facility through which all troops leaving for (or returning from) active deployments must pass in order to receive medical treatment and where Hasan, as one of Fort Hood's physicians, worked frequently.[110] Thus, Hasan was intimately familiar with the facility's layout and traffic flow and likely had no need to conduct any additional surveillance in specific preparation for his attack. Needless to say, no members of outside terror groups played a role in helping the Army doctor to familiarize himself with the processing center.

8.3.4 FINANCE AND LOGISTICS

The logistics of Hasan's attack took place in similar isolation. He had no need for outside funding, because his operation required only the purchase of a handgun and ammunition—items that were easily within the budget of the major's $92,000 per year income. Indeed, financial ties between Hasan and the global jihadist movement ran in the other direction, albeit indirectly. Hasan lived exceptionally modestly in an off-post apartment so that he could make significant zakat (Islamic tithing) contributions; estimates claim that he donated approximately one-third of his annual income to Islamic charities, many of which held implicit financial ties to terror groups.[111]

As regards the choosing of specific supplies, Hasan was methodical and selective. On August 1, about two weeks after al-Awlaki's condemnation of Muslim-American soldiers, Hasan entered "Guns Galore" in Killeen, Texas, and sought the advice of salesmen and customers to find "the most high-tech handgun" on the market. He then purchased an FN Five-Seven semi-automatic pistol, because of its light weight and 30 round capacity ammunition clip, as well as an expensive laser sight to make the weapon easier to aim.[112] At some point prior to the attack—the timing of the event is unknown—Hasan also acquired a Smith and Wesson .357 magnum revolver, which police found on his person, loaded but unfired, in the aftermath of the attack.[113]

In the several weeks preceding the attack, the major slowly stockpiled both ammunition and spare magazines, so that he could reload quickly on the day of the attack by simply swapping-out empty clips for pre-loaded replacements.[114] The pace of his acquisitions suggests that Hasan wanted to avoid raising suspicion by purchasing too many items at once. In short, it seems that from his choice of gun to the manner in which he bought bullets, everything Hasan did was in careful preparation for a shooting spree.

8.3.5 TRAINING

Like the Fort Dix plotters and Muhammad, Hasan self-trained by shooting at a firing range. However, the major was more methodical in his preparation. In lieu of intermittent trips to the Poconos or impromptu practice sessions at abandoned construction sites, Hasan visited the range more than once a week for roughly two months.[115] Moreover, as a former enlisted soldier and a current Army officer, Hasan benefitted from experience that was the plotters discussed in the previous cases never had. Simply put, Hasan may not have needed much in the way of training beyond what he had already learned from the very organization he was about to attack.

8.3.6 OPERATIONS

On November 5, the attack began a little after 1.30pm, when Hasan, who had been quietly sitting at a table in the middle of the processing center, rose and shouted ―Allahu Akbar (god is great),‖ before firing at a crowd of soldiers who had queued awaiting medical examination. Witnesses described his actions as cool and methodical; Hasan passed-up several opportunities to shoot civilians and instead concentrated his fire on those in uniform. Indeed, the only civilian to die in the attack was a civilian psychiatrist, who charged Hasan in an attempt to disarm him.[116] The extra rounds and magazines Hasan had purchased allowed him to reload so swiftly that his rate of fire was almost continuous; one staff sergeant, who was waiting to receive an anthrax vaccination-booster in another room of the processing facility when the shooting began, initially though that someone had opened fire with an M16.[117]

When Hasan left the processing facility in search of more targets, he encountered two members of Fort Hood's civilian police department, who felled him in an exchange of fire that left both officers wounded and the gunman paralyzed from the chest down. According to a count of the spent bullet casings found at the scene, Hasan fired 214 rounds during his 10-minute rampage, and when police searched the crippled attacker, they found an additional 177 rounds in extra magazines, as well as the loaded .357 magnum revolver. Thus, Hasan would have been able to cause several more casualties, if police had not halted his fratricidal attack.[118]

8.3.7 SUMMATION

Like the preceding discussion of the 2009 Little Rock shootings, Hasan's case suggests that al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula has begun to play an especially worrying role in the promulgation of radical ideology among homegrown American Islamists. It was to this organization, rather than the core group of al-Qaida, that Hasan held ties. Although these links were direct, personal, and comparatively strong, the currently available evidence suggests that they were entirely of a non-operational character. Al-Awlaki fomented the shooting by inspiring Hasan, but the radical preacher does not seem to have directed the major's actions. To be blunt, it seems that Hasan planned the specifics of the event in isolation. Moreover, Hasan took care of his own logistics and finance, as well as the little training that he required beyond the knowledge he already possessed from his time in uniform. Thus, like the Little Rock shooting, Hasan's rampage is also best described as an AQAP-inspired attack, albeit one that was planned and executed with considerably greater skill.

The Fort Hood shooting is also similar to the Little Rock attack in another important way: both were ultimately preventable. Hasan's superiors at USUHS and Walter Reed share some culpability for his attack, because although Hasan consistently ranked in the lowest 25 percent of his residency and fellowship programs, he received positive performance reviews that stressed the value of his "research" into Islamist extremism. Not only did these assessments facilitate Hasan's promotion from captain to major—the promotion that landed the Army doctor at Fort hood—they also had the second-order effect of discouraging federal investigators assigned to a San Diego-based Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) from adequately investigating Hasan's background when they became aware of his email exchange with al-Awlaki, who had been on the FBI's radar since the preacher's association with the 9/11 hijackers first came to light in 2002. Based on the Army's official assessment of Hasan, investigators concluded that his communications must be part of legitimate research on terrorism, and closed their inquiry in a single day.[119] Had they conducted even the most cursory examination of Hasan's finances, they would have had cause for concern, because this inquiry would have revealed his association with Islamist "charities."[120] Therefore, hasty police work also contributed to the failure.

However, Hasan's attack differs from the Little Rock shooting in another very key way: in terms of impact. The Fort Hood shooting ultimately demonstrates the extent of damage that jihadists whose only ties to existing terror groups are ideological in nature can cause. Despite struggling during portions of his medical training, Hasan's overall pattern of scholastic achievement demonstrates that he was exceptionally bright, if perhaps a touch unstable. Thus, his planning and careful preparations are quite likely near the high-end of what any aspiring jihadist could initiate without substantive assistance from an outside group.

Similarly, as an American citizen and a resident of Texas (a state with notoriously liberal gun laws), Hasan did not face the same logistical hurdles that plagued the weapons-acquisition efforts undertaken by the Duka brothers, who as undocumented immigrants had no ability to purchase arms on the legitimate market. Therefore, Hasan's case also offers an example of logistical conditions that are nearly ideal for jihadists. The major could have acquired virtually any pistol or rifle on the market with relative ease.

His level of training was also reasonably high. As a former Army enlisted man and a serving Army officer, Hasan had received professional firearms instruction at various points in his military career. Nothing suggests that Hasan was an expert marksman, but his weapons proficiency was far higher than levels self-trained terrorists would be likely to obtain on their own.

Finally, Hasan's nearly six figure income demonstrates that he could have met the financial and logistical requirements of a much larger attack with relative ease, especially if he had been willing to bankrupt himself in the process, because, after all, martyrs have little need of material things. Therefore, the relatively unsophisticated nature of his attack cannot be written-off to financial constraints as could be done in relation to Muhammad's amateurish efforts at jihad. Put differently, Hasan's method of attack is likely indicative of broader trends not only because the Fort Dix plotters and the Little Rock shooter employed (or attempted to employ) similar approaches, but also because Hasan's finances did not constrain him to this approach.

More destructive scenarios than the Fort Hood shooting remain a possibility, but given that a smart, well-financed, reasonably well-trained jihadist with fairly broad access to weapons was able to cause only moderate casualties, it seems unlikely that other terrorists operating without organizational support will fare much better. Hasan's case, therefore, suggests that homegrown terrorists with loose non-functional connections to established radical groups remain a threat, but a limited one. It seems that al-Qaida (or AQAP) inspired terrorists are fairly unlikely to cause more than two or three dozen serious casualties in any single attack. To be blunt: homegrown Islamist terrorism does not even come close to representing an existential threat to the United States.

Finally, beyond threat assessments, Hasan's experience says a great deal about the role that first-hand interactions play in the indoctrination process, especially when this case is viewed alongside this chapter's other two cases. Although the Internet played an important role in radicalization in at least two of the three cases, timing is everything. Both Hassan and the Fort Dix plotters seem to have consumed the bulk of their online jihadist propaganda after they already subscribed to radical ideologies, much the way that new golfers often begin to watch PGA events on television in the hopes of emulating tour professionals. While this consumption almost certainly helped to harden these jihadists' radical views, first-person interactions with other existing fundamentalists seem to have been the initial trigger in both cases, as demonstrated by Hasan's interaction with al-Awlaki in Virginia in 2001, and the Duka brothers' purported interactions with their radicalized ex-convict uncle and their subsequent influence over the other Fort Dix plotters. Though the open-source record has remained mute on Muhammad's consumption of online propaganda, the Little Rock case also demonstrates the importance of first-person interactions, because the social treatment he respectively received from Jewish and Muslim congregations ultimately determined which religion he selected, and his time in fundamentalist-influenced Yemen changed him from a devout Muslim into a radical Islamist.

8.4 CONCLUSION

Although it may be inappropriate to draw conclusions about the overall extent of al-Qaida's ideological role in the global violent Islamist movement based solely on three cases, the similarities between the events discussed in this chapter make it possible to draw reasonable conclusions about the nature of the al-Qaida's involvement in plots and attacks conducted by ~~"~~homegrown" American jihadists. As table 8.1 summarizes, al-Qaida has had a small and often indirect ideological role in such attacks, but has not played a demonstrable functional role.

Moreover, the theoretical implications of these cases are fairly clear and help to resolve the existing debate regarding the nature of the Internet's role in the radicalization process. While these cases demonstrate that online jihadist propaganda remains a worrying phenomenon because it helps to harden radical viewpoints, the evidence suggests that theories which argue that the consumption of online propaganda leads to the adoption of radical views are deeply flawed. Indeed, it seems that such arguments may have reversed the direction of causality, because several of the individuals included in these cases began to view large quantities of propaganda only after becoming radicalized. Repeated interactions with individuals who already held radical views seem to have played the largest role in the indoctrination process, suggesting that radicalization is a socio-cultural process that requires first-person involvement, rather than virtual participation.

However, the limited scope of this inquiry dictates that additional research is required both to establish the frequency of these patterns and to measure the scale of interactions between variables. Given that it seems unlikely that all radicals follow the same trajectory in their adoption of extremist viewpoints, additional research must also assess the existence and regularity of other pathways to radicalization. Ultimately, this chapter raises as many questions as it answers.

9.0 CONCLUSIONS AND POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

At the broadest level, this analysis has shown that al-Qaida's involvement in Islamist-motivated terror devolved in the decade following the 9/11 attacks. The modified snowball data, the Newman-based modeling process, and the Baleian typology combined to demonstrate that after 2001 the number of plots and attacks in which al-Qaida played a strong functional role spiked briefly in 2002 and 2003, before falling in 2004. By 2005, al-Qaida was strongly involved in only a small handful of annual Islamist-motivated terror attacks and plots, and as of 2010, the organization had not regained a more prominent role. Al-Qaida's weak functional involvement in events followed a similar pattern, and tailed-off dramatically after reaching a high in 2004. In recent years, former members of al-Qaida have conducted an increasingly large share of the total number of Islamist-motivated terror plots and attacks, owing in no small part to the efforts of AQAP. Indeed, al-Qaida's alumni were responsible for roughly 30 percent of the terror events included in the snowball sample in 2010. Meanwhile, the share of "al-Qaida inspired" plots and attacks has never been especially large and has comprised more than 10 percent of the total events in a given year. Since the middle of the decade, a majority of Islamist-motivated terror events have not involved bin Laden's organization in any way. Thus, the numbers suggest that today's al-Qaida is far from the global terrorist juggernaut that some observers assume it to be.

As table 9.1 summarizes, the nature of al-Qaida's involvement in terror attacks has also degraded substantially over time. The quality and capability of attack-teams closely associated with the organization are far lower today than they were in the late-1990s and early-2000s, when al-Qaida respectively bombed U.S. Embassies in East Africa and conducted the 9/11 attacks on New York and Washington, D.C. Regardless of whether attacks and plots were conducted on al-Qaida's "home turf" or in the Western world, the teams responsible for these events have become progressively less trained, while simultaneously receiving decreased access to al-Qaida's financial and logistical resources. Given these circumstances, it is unsurprising that the amount of support al-Qaida has been able to offer to partner organizations has also waned tremendously. For example, Jemaah Islamiyah's experience suggests that organizations that once received limited operational and financial backing from bin Laden's organization now operate without the benefit of al-Qaida's strategic, tactical, logistical, or financial support. The evidence suggests that by the mid-2000s, even the historical training relationship that existed between JI and bin Laden's organization had dissipated.

However, the data also suggests that there is some variance in the nature of regional organizations' respective relationships to al-Qaida. Neither AQIM nor AQAP appear to have ever benefited from the type of financial support that JI formerly enjoyed, yet the training relationship between these organizations and al-Qaida, while still historical, continues to influence AQIM and AQAP to a greater extent that JI, quite likely because these organizations have yet to fully experience the sorts of effects that JI suffered when counterterrorism initiatives eliminated Hambali, Azahari Husin, and other prominent individuals with al-Qaida ties. Still, it is important not to overstate the case: although regional organizations' adoption of names featuring the term "al-Qaida" implies tremendous unity with bin Laden's organization, the evidence ultimately suggests that al-Qaida's functional ties to its regional affiliates have actually waned in recent years. Thus, both quantitative and qualitative methodologies point toward the same conclusion: although the threat posed by violent Islamists continues to merit the sustained attention of the global security community, the fight against al-Qaida as an organization has been largely won.

These macro-level conclusions have implications for both terrorism research and counterterrorism policy; the three sections following this introduction examine these subjects in detail. The first section discusses the implications this analysis has to the theoretical discourse on Islamist-motivated terrorism and posits that contemporary Islamist terrorism is best understood as a multi-polar threat. The second section discusses the implications this analysis has for future research on Islamist terrorism and summarizes how the methodological contributions of this analysis may benefit subsequent researchers. Finally, the third section turns its attention towards policy and offers several specific recommendations to augment the already well-designed counterterrorism strategy the Obama administration unveiled in June 2011.

9.1 IMPLICATIONS FOR THE THEORETICAL DISCOURSE ON ISLAMIST-MOTIVATED TERRORISM

The most important theoretical contribution of this analysis is to refute the hypothesis that al-Qaida‘s central leadership continued to direct global terrorist operations even after the Global War on Terrorism (GWOT) came into full swing. Although the proposition that al-Qaida exhibited a strong measure of control over the Islamist terror movement experienced a degree of intellectual resurgence when American authorities discovered documents related to several terror plots at the Abbottabad compound where bin Laden was killed in 2011, a detailed review of the organization‘s involvement in plots and attacks clearly demonstrates al-Qaida‘s waning involvement in the tactical planning of events. Moreover, al-Qaida‘s ability to provide attack-teams with high-caliber training has been tremendously constrained, and the organization‘s role in the funding and logistical support of attacks has evaporated almost completely. Simply put, the evidence suggests that al-Qaida‘s functional role in terrorism has been greatly curtailed, and that those jihadists who continue to operate as part of bin Laden's organization are less capable, less experienced, less trained, and less able to access al-Qaida's ever-shrinking financial and logistical resources than their predecessors in the late 1990s and early 2000s. It would be premature to dismiss the possibility of al-Qaida's resurgence, but it seems that the organization which surrounded bin Laden until his death in 2011 has been largely defeated.

The fact that that the dissident Saudi possessed documents regarding past attacks does not constitue evidence that he or his top lieutenants played prominent roles in these events' planning, preparation, or finance. Indeed, many analysts with access to the Abbottabad documents suggest that they demonstrate that al-Qaida members increasingly ignored bin Laden in the years preceding his death. It will be quite some time before the full truth of the matter can is definitively established, because it will take years for the Abbottabad documents find their way into the open-source, and still more time before the expert community reaches a meaningful consensus regarding their interpretation. Thus, definitive pronouncements on either side of the debate regarding al-Qaida's role in directing the Islamist terrorism are premature, but with this substantial caveat, the currently available evidence simply does not support the view that bin Laden or al-Qaida continued to lead the Islamist terror movement in any capacity beyond a vague ideological role.

However, these criticisms of the al-Qaida-centric view of Islamist terrorism should not be interpreted as support for a leaderless characterization of the jihadist threat. Only about seven percent of the attacks and plots included in the snowball sample were categorized at "al-Qaida inspired," and although there has been a significant upward trend in the frequency of such attacks since 2005, the absolute number remains low. Indeed, the maximum number of "al-Qaida inspired" attacks conducted in a single year never exceeded half a dozen. Moreover, al-Qaida's inspiration role within the broader violent Islamist movement is subject to question, because the examples of Abdul Hakim Muhammad and Nidal Hasan, who respectively conducted the 2009 Little Rock shooting and the 2009 Fort Hood shooting, demonstrate that many individuals drew religious motivation from members of regional groups like AQAP, rather than from members of bin Laden's organization. In short, the evidence suggests that al-Qaida's oft-cited ideological role in terrorism may also be exaggerated.[1129]

There are also tremendous problems with the quality of leaderless attacks. Though it may be premature to generalize to an entire phenomenon based on only three cases, the examples offered by Muhammad and the Fort Dix plotters suggest that many jihadists who act without organizational support or training are exceptionally hapless. Hasan's example, meanwhile, suggests that even bright, well-funded terrorists can cause only moderate damage when they act in isolation. More lethal scenarios remain a possibility, but it seems clear that _inspired' terrorists who act in isolation are not the preeminent extremist threat facing the United States. Ultimately, leaderless theories of jihad and theories which argue that al-Qaida somehow controls the Islamist terror movement are equally flawed.

Rather than merely critiquing existing theories that attempt to explain the breadth of the jihadist threat, this analysis offers its own explanation and theorizes that the contemporary Islamist terror movement is multi-polar. It contains a diverse collection of functionally autonomous organizations that make independent decisions on strategy and tactics, and that have independent access to substantial logistical and financial resources. Some training partnerships have existed between these independent organizations and al-Qaida in the past, and though the evidence of ongoing training ties is shaky, they may continue to the present at a low frequency. However, to the limited extent that regional terror groups hold functional ties to al-Qaida, devolutionary trends characterize the long-term relationships. Fewer and fewer al-Qaida trainees and former al-Qaida members remain active after each successive counterterrorism strike, and regional organizations' independent access to considerable financial, logistical, and training resources mitigates these groups' need for access to al-Qaida's steadily waning organizational assets.

[1129] In her work on Islamists terrorism in Europe, Alison Pargeter independently reached a similar conclusion, arguing that although ~~it~~ is widely assumed that these Islamists are somehow linked to or share the same ideology as Al-Qa'ida and Osama Bin Laden . . . . in many cases these links and perceived aspirations are often more tenuous than is suggested and the particularities of the various groups and movements are regularly overlooked." The New Frontiers of Jihad: Radical Islam in Europe, (Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2008), p. vii.

Moreover, this analysis posits an explanation for the extent of organizations' independence. AQIM's experience in the Sahara and AQAP's brief history in Yemen both suggest that the extent of regional terror groups' engagement with al-Qaida is inversely causally related to their access to financial resources. Given that both AQIM and AQAP seem to derive the vast majority of their revenue through crime, there is some evidence to support an even more specific theory positing an inverse causal relationship between regional organizations' involvement in crime and the extent of their functional partnership with al-Qaida. Because Noordin Mohd Top also relied heavily on criminal means of fundraising as he began to operate with increasing independence from Jemaah Islamiyah's titular leadership, this theory may be more broadly generalizable to groups beyond al-Qaida. Involvement in crime likely plays a significant role in determining the extent of fractures within the Islamist terror movement, by granting entrepreneurially-inclined jihadists the financial freedom and independent access to weapons necessary to conduct operations without support from a parent organization. However, the inchoate nature of open-source data on terrorist finance in North Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, and Southeast Asia dictates that this theory is speculative in nature and requires additional testing.

Beyond macro-level theoretical interpretations, this analysis also weighs in on a pair of smaller debates within the existing literature on terrorism. First, theories which describe the formation of splinter groups in terms of sharp, acrimonious splits require amendment. While cases including the history of the Provisional Irish Republican Army and its successor organizations demonstrate that new groups often form as the result of pronounced intra-organizational fractures, Noordin Mohd Top's experience shows that gradual processes can also characterize the formation of new groups. Indeed, the organization that Noordin led, namely Tanzim Qoidatul Jihad in Indonesia, emerged slowly from Jemaah Islamiyah over the course of several years, as Noordin acted with increasing independence and autonomy in each attack that he conducted between 2003 and his death in 2009.

Finally, this analysis contributes not only to theories of group formation and terrorist finance, but also to the literature which studies the process of radicalization. Specifically, case studies of the 2007 Fort Dix plot, the 2009 Little Rock shooting, and the 2009 Fort Hood massacre refute the hypothesis that online jihadist propaganda causes its viewers to adopt extremist views. As other theorists have previously argued, network effects seem to be the primary cause of radicalization, because the evidence suggests that the men responsible for the three efforts against American military facilities described above became radicalized as the result of first-person interactions with individuals who already adhered to extremist viewpoints. Moreover, this analysis partially reconciles this socio-cultural view of radicalization with the literature regarding the dangers of online propaganda by positing that repeated viewings of jihadist Internet content hardens and reinforces views initially established via person-to-person interactions. Though the argument is somewhat speculative, it also seems reasonable to infer that repeated viewings of violent Islamist web-pages play an important role in desensitizing aspiring jihadists to the gory realities of terrorism prior to the conduct of attacks.

9.2 IMPLICATIONS FOR FUTURE RESEARCH AND METHODOLOGY

Given that both the quantitative and qualitative portions of this assessment are based exclusively on open-source data, a pool of information that is by its very nature is both incomplete and potentially inaccurate, this study‘s implications for additional research can be summarized incredibly succinctly: the theories generated by this analysis require additional testing as more data and additional cases materialize. However, the methodological contributions of this analysis speak to the means that can be used to analyze any new data that emerges on al-Qaida‘s role in Islamist terrorism.

First and foremost, the modified snowball sampling method provides a rigorous and replicable means to acquire large pools of data on any clandestine topic and should be of value to researchers of both quantitative and qualitative persuasions, because regardless of the methodology researchers use, terrorism must ultimately be investigated at the individual level in order to obtain the detailed information necessary to accurately assess organizations‘ roles in terrorism. The ontology of relationship types, which this study generated by reviewing the broader literature on terrorism and clandestine networks, is also useful for researchers hailing from different methodological traditions, because it provides a systematic means to reconcile the conflation that results when analysts neglect to consider the nature of interactions between violent Islamists. Put differently, the ontology is both comprehensive enough and specific enough to allow researchers to differentiate meaningful functional ties from affinity bonds that exist between friends, family members, and adherents of the same worldview.

Similarly, the Baleian typology provides a system of classification useful for operationalizing a multi-relational characterization of the Islamist terror movement. By distinguishing events in which al-Qaida played a strong functional role from events in which the organization played a weaker supporting role, events perpetrated by former members of al-Qaida, and events to which the organization is tied only by ideology, this typology can help mitigate analysts' all-too-common tendency to describe events and organizations as vaguely ~~"~~al-Qaida linked." Although this analysis implemented a system of quantitative measurements to classify events, the typology may also be of use to researchers who view evidence in qualitative terms, as it can be easily modified to accommodate softer forms of evidence. Indeed, Bale relied exclusively on narrative in order to locate a case in his original typology, on which this analysis drew heavily to create a more comprehensive system of classification.

Finally, quantitatively-minded researchers may also find utility in several of the processes used within this analysis. The Meadian-Additive Projection Process (MAPP) has clear applications beyond terrorism research. It would be appropriate to MAPP virtually any multi-modal network dataset derived from the historical record, because most such datasets contain the sort of ambiguous dates of interaction that routinely problematize information on violent Islamists.

The network-based processes this analysis used to determine the extent of organizations' involvement in terror events and the Newman-based grouping method this analysis used to determine the boundaries of Islamist terror groups may also prove useful to scholars studying terrorism from a quantitative perspective. However, both of these methodologies require tremendous amounts of reliable data to produce meaningful outputs; any results obtained from their use should be interpreted with extreme caution if this precondition is not met. The grouping method suffers from a second even more daunting limitation that plagues all efforts to assign terrorists to specific organizations: membership characterizations remain impossible to test, because even within the terror groups, few—if any—people actually know where the boundaries of these organizations lie. Consequently, while this study's Newman-based method for assigning group membership is far more rigorous and replicable than previous studies' highly subjective "this guy feels like an al-Qaida member" approach, evaluation methods that specifically address grouping tests among clandestine organizations constitute one especially rich area for future research in the broader methodological community.

9.3 IMPLICATIONS FOR COUNTERTERRORISM POLICY

Given the clandestine and amorphous nature of the violent Islamist movement, counterterrorism officials do not have the luxury of waiting for complete evidence before enacting policies to mitigate the threat of jihadist terrorism. Therefore, this analysis uses its tentative conclusions to inform policy recommendations aimed at enhancing the already well-designed National Strategy for Counterterrorism released by the Obama administration in June 2011. The subsections below discuss these recommendations as they apply to seven specific goals the strategy outlines in its overarching plan to disrupt, degrade, and dismantle the threat posed by Islamist terrorsim.[1130]

9.3.1 PROTECT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE, HOMELAND, AND AMERICAN INTERESTS

The National Strategy for Counterterrorism brackets much of its discussion of protecting the homeland in terms of "hardening" the country. The document's discussion of the need to build a "culture of preparedness and resiliency" correctly stresses that the hardening process is as much about the nation's need to recognize that terrorism can never be completely eliminated as it is about building bunker-like infrastructure.[1131] However, the cases included in this analysis suggest that physical security measures are among the most effective uses of money and resources to mitigate the threat of Islamist terrorism.

For example, low-cost concrete walls and security bollards can virtually eliminate the threat that vehicle-based bombs pose to key buildings. In the 1998 embassy bombings, the Nairobi attack was effective because Hamden Awad (a.k.a. Ahmed the German) was able to drive the bomb-truck alongside the building before detonating, while the Dar es Salaam bomb was far less lethal because the Tanzanian security guards heroically stopped the vehicle at the gate at the expense of their own lives. Similarly, the 2003 Marriott bombing failed to destroy the hotel because the security guards' reactions cause Asmar Latin Sani to detonate his weapon before he was able to place the weapon alongside the building. These cases not only speak to the specific value of well-trained security personnel, but also to the more general conclusion that measures which keep vehicles even a short distance from key facilities greatly reduce the potential for casualties.

Moreover, a pair of additional examples speak to the specific value of barricades. The perpetrators of the 2004 bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta, Indonesia, failed to meet their desired goal of leveling the embassy because the bomb-vehicle was unable to pass through the building's fortified security gate. Similarly, the 2008 attack on the United States embassy in Sana'a, Yemen, failed to kill even a single American because a concrete barricade prevented the suicide-bombers from entering the compound. In short, public buildings can improve their security from terror by erecting inexpensive concrete walls and security bollards, which skilled architects should be able to unobtrusively incorporate into both new and old designs. Indeed, government buildings have made far wider use of such barricades since the violent Islamist threat first rose to prominence in the late 1990s, but privately-owned structures have been slow to follow suit. Therefore, this study ultimately recommends that office towers, high-rise apartment buildings, prominent hotels, and other similar structures build the sort of security barricades that have become commonplace among federal buildings.

However, it would be foolish to suggest that this simple improvement provides flawless security. Security barricades are impractical for many buildings located in dense urban areas; for example, short of the impractical solution of closing the streets, it is difficult to imagine how to prevent large vehicles from pulling alongside many of the skyscrapers in downtown Manhattan or Chicago‘s Loop. Moreover, one reasonable explanation for Noordin‘s transition from large vehicle-bombs, such as those used in the 2003 Marriott attack and the 2004 Australian embassy attack, to smaller man-portable explosive devices, such as those used in the 2005 Bali bombings and the 2009 Marriott-Ritz bombings, is as a response to physical security measures that mitigated the lethality of car-bombings. Thus, not only are there areas where security barricades cannot be installed, but their construction may simply cause terrorists to adopt other means to attack the same targets.

To an extent, physical security improvements can be undertaken iteratively, in response to changes in terrorists‘ tactics. However, this strategy has clear limitations, because when taken to its logical extreme, physical security measures assume Orwellian dimensions, in which protection from terrorism takes precedence over freedom of movement. Therefore, unobtrusive measures, like security barricades to prevent car-bombings, should be as widely implemented among large privately-owned structures as they have among government buildings, but the most that the physical hardening of targets can hope to achieve is to mitigate terrorists‘ ability to employ specific and especially dangerous tactics. Put differently, physical security measures can force terrorists toward less efficient means of attack, but can do little to reduce the overall likelihood of terrorism.

9.3.2 PREVENT TERRORIST DEVELOPMENT, ACQUISITION, AND USE OF WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION

The importance of preventing terrorists from acquiring Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) is difficult to overstate, because, as Allison noted in his assessment of nuclear terrorism, WMD offer the only means by which terrorism can become an existential threat to Western society.[1132] However, the cases included in this analysis suggest that efforts at securitization need to take a broader approach. Obvious solutions, such as monitoring the whereabouts of weapons scientists and securing global stockpiles of chemical and nuclear weapons, remain important, but because violent Islamists have made repeated attempts to transform mundane items into weapons that threaten hundreds of lives instead of hundreds of thousands, it is equally necessary to monitor everyday items that can be converted to lethal purpose.

Within the last 12 months, federal regulators have made some positive strides in this direction. In August 2011, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) announced new reporting requirements for nitrogen-based fertilizers, which constituted the primary explosive component in Ramzi Yousef‘s 1993 World Trade Center bombing, several of Noordin Mohd Top‘s attacks in Southeast Asia, Omar Khyam‘s failed plot against London in 2004, and numerous improvised explosive devices in Iraq and Afghanistan—to say nothing of ammonium-nitrates‘ use by terrorists motivated by ideologies other than Islamist extremism, such as Timothy McVeigh, who used a mixture of fuel oil and fertilizer to bomb the Murrah Federal building in Oklahoma City in April 1995.[1133] The proposed regulations, which were still under review at the time of this writing, would require merchants to register fertilizer sales of 25 pounds or more, a threshold that regulators deemed meaningful because explosives experts claim that a bomb capable of leveling an average single-family home could be manufactured from just 25 pounds of fertilizer.[1134] Implementation of this reporting system represents an important step, but because terrorists will still be able to amass chemical stockpiles by either making several small purchases in lieu of a single large one, or by smuggling fertilizer into the United States from neighboring countries, this system will mitigate, not solve, the threat posed by nitrogen-based fertilizer.

Moreover, other household materials can be repurposed toward destructive intent. A host of attacks, including the London bombings of July 7, 2005; the failed attempt on the same city 14 days later; and Najibullah Zazi's plot against the New York City subway system in 2009, all demonstrate that hydrogen peroxide has also been a favorite base-chemical among Islamist bomb-makers. Although federal regulators have worked to secure concentrated variants of the chemical, which the food safety and agricultural industries use in a host of disinfecting applications, merchants are not currently required to report the sale of hydrogen peroxide in concentrations below 35 percent.[1135] There are small hints that the FBI has used provisions of the Patriot Act to surreptitiously monitor retail purchases of hydrogen peroxide at lower concentrations,[1136] but the specifics of the operation—if one exists at all—remain unclear.

In lieu of clandestine programs, policy makers should consider implementing a transparent nation-wide system to monitor retail sales of hydrogen peroxide. Because the chemical has applications that stretch across a wide assortment of industries, ranging from horticulture to hair-dressing,[1137] the same sort of monitoring system DHS has designed to monitor fertilizer sales at comparatively specialized farm-supply retailers is likely unworkable. Given the diversity of hydrogen peroxide's uses, monitoring efforts must reference other systems which have been designed to monitor chemicals of concern that are sold in small quantities at a wide assortment of retail outlets.

Consequently, efforts to stop the production of methamphetamine may offer a useable model. The Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act of 2005 (CMEA) included several provisions to regulate the retail sale of pseudoephedrine and other chemicals that are commonly available in over-the-counter medications, but which "cooks" can also convert into methamphetamine using fairly simple chemical processes. On the customer's side of the equation, CMEA limits the amount of pseudoephedrine that anyone can purchase in a single day, as well as in any given month. Meanwhile, CMEA requires retailers to place products containing pseudoephedrine "out of direct customer access," to maintain detailed logbooks registering sales, and to validate customers' government-issued identification documents prior to completing any sale.[1138] In short, the law effectively balances consumers‘ legitimate need for pseudoephedrine-based products with the risks inherent to drug-production.

Given that consumers have similar legitimate needs for products containing large amounts of hydrogen peroxide, and given that both cold medication and hydrogen peroxide-based products are sold in retail outlets ranging from tiny neighborhood convenience stores to massive big-box stores, it seems exceptionally feasible for legislators to implement a CMEA-like law to address the threat posed by hydrogen peroxide. Moreover, as CMEA contains financial penalties for retailers who violate the legislation, the effort to monitor pseudoephedrine is largely self-financing.[1139] Thus, there is little reason to expect that a well-planned effort to monitor hydrogen peroxide would impose an additional burden on the already strained federal budget.

However, it is important to note that monitoring regimes are, by their very nature, imperfect. They make it more difficult, but not impossible, to obtain substances. Fortunately, the transparent nature of the systems offers an ancillary benefit: publicity. If people are aware that items are closely monitored, it is reasonable to assume that individuals will be dissuaded from attempting such products‘ illicit acquisition and will devote increasing attention to alternative materials, which may be more poorly suited to lethal purpose. In short, the publicity inherent to monitoring regimes will likely help force terrorists toward the difficult task of innovation.

In turn, the likelihood that monitoring regimes will cause jihadists to adopt new means of attacks speaks to two additional recommendations, both of which must involve industry as well as government. The first recommendation is to conduct a more proactive review of unrestricted commercial goods which terrorists could repurpose for use in attacks. Aspects of this review have already been conducted within the government,[1140] but many top chemists and engineers work in academia and industry, where the pay is typically higher. Including civilian researchers' input would significantly broaden the pool of expertise and would allow regulators to compile a more comprehensive list of things that could be used to conduct an attack, in lieu of the current list, which is more reactive and focuses primarily on items that have already been used. However, it also seems likely that including civilian researchers' input might help to winnow the monitoring lists by removing from consideration any substances that effectively serve as false positives and constitute incredibly improbable means of attack. Put most simply, subjecting monitoring lists to outside review would strengthen the monitoring process by adding rigor.

The second recommendation is to push for technical solutions that will confound terrorists' efforts toward repurposing commonly available chemicals. To an extent, this effort has also already begun. For example, in 2008, the manufacturer Honeywell International debuted a nitrogen-based fertilizer specially designed to remain inert even when mixed with fuel oil.[1141] The discussion of specific chemical processes is beyond the scope of this inquiry, but it hardly seems a stretch to suggest that American industry has the capacity to create similarly non-explosive alternatives to hydrogen peroxide and many other potentially lethal products. While encouraging such innovations should be a relatively simple affair because such products would likely generate a windfall of cash for patent-holders in safety conscious America, there are clear limits to the advances technical solutions can offer. It is, for example, difficult to envision the invention of an inert alternative to the gasoline Abdul Hakim Muhammad used in the Molotov cocktail he hurled during his failed attempt to firebomb a rabbi's home in Nashville, Tennessee. Thus, all efforts to mitigate the threat of Islamist terrorism by securing dual-use goods are ultimately imperfect.

One other policy change that would mitigate terrorists' access to weapons within the United States is politically infeasible: gun control. The NRA Foundation vociferously defends unregulated gun ownership on second amendment grounds.[1142] Given that the organization ranks among the top-ten tax-exempt organizations (501c) in terms of political spending in the current election cycle—its total contributions are more than $340,000 and climbing[1143]—any efforts to change gun policy, even in the name of counterterrorism policy, are unlikely to meet with success. Indeed, attempts to resurrect the Federal Assault Weapons Ban (AWB), which prohibited the manufacture of some types of semi-automatic rifles for civilian use between 1994 and 2004, have all failed even to reach the floor of Congress for a vote.[1144] Efforts at gun control simply burn political capital that is better spent improving other aspects of counterterrorism policy.

Moreover, the efficacy of gun control measures remains problematic because they do a poor job of defining terms like "assault weapon" and cannot address the weapons-acquisition efforts of first-time terrorists with clean criminal records. For example, although Nidal Hasan made use of high-capacity magazines that would have been prohibited by the AWB during the Fort Hood shooting,[1145] the act would have done nothing to prohibit him from purchasing the gun used in the attack. As a fairly standard semi-automatic pistol, it would not have qualified as an assault weapon, and because Hasan had never been convicted of a felony—indeed, he was a serving officer in the United States Army at the time of the Fort Hood shooting—there would have been no grounds to preclude him from buying any legally-available gun he wanted.

Similarly, although gun control measures may reduce the total number of new weapons in production, these initiatives do little to stop terrorists who are willing to result to illicit means to obtain arms. For example, the Duka brothers and Abdul Hakim Muhammad respectively acquired weapons through straw purchases and the black market. Thus, it remains to be seen how anything short of an unrealistic and unwanted total ban on guns could have prevented the Fort Hood shooter, the Little Rock shooter, or the Fort Dix plotters' attempts to gain weapons. In combination with the political climate of the United States, these considerations preclude this analysis from recommending additional gun control measures as a viable means of reducing the risk Islamist terrorism poses to the United States.

9.3.3 ELIMINATE SAFEHAVENS

The National Strategy for Counterterrorism is correct to prioritize efforts to eliminate physical sanctuaries which permit terrorists "to travel, train, and engage in plotting."[1146] Indeed, the evidence strongly suggests that repeated first-person interactions are necessary to transmit the tacit knowledge needed to successfully replicate many tasks that are vital to terrorists, thereby making the physical spaces where such interactions occur among jihadists' most valuable [1145] Specifically, the AWB prohibited the sale of any ammunition feeding devices which held more than 10 rounds. See: Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Sec. 110103 (Ban of Large Capacity Ammunition Feeding Devices), sub-paragraph b (Definition of Large Capacity Ammunition Feeding Device); available online: http://thomas.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/F?c103:1:./temp/~c103SJ9kia:e644150:.

resources. Bomb-making provides the clearest example. Even after receiving some brief training abroad, Muktar Said Ibrahim and Najibullah Zazi, who respectively served as bomb-makers in the failed attack on London's mass transit system on July 21, 2005, and the disrupted plot against the New York City subway system in 2009, were unable to successfully follow written instructions regarding the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide-based explosives.[1147] Assuming that written instructions were the only training resource available, it seems likely that aspiring bomb-makers who lack the pair's experience in South Asia would fare even worse.[1148] The existence of Internet training resources demonstrate that it is at least theoretically possible for novice jihadists to acquire the information necessary to conduct an attack without visiting a terrorist safehaven,[1149] but Ibrahim and Zazi's examples ultimately suggest that reducing the amount of physical space available to terrorists will effectively reduce the amount of knowledge at the disposal of future generations of violent Islamists.

[1147] There are numerous examples that highlight the importance of tacit knowledge to the successful completion of technical undertakings like bomb-making. Gormley describes the difficulty non-state actors face in acquiring the tacit knowledge necessary to build weapons that are widely avaialbe even to impoverished militaries in his discussion of the difficulties faced by Bruce Simpson, a New Zealand-based engineer, when he attempt (and failed) to construct a cruise missile using commercially available components. Collins discusses the importance of tacit knowledge in the conduct of experiements in material sciences by highlighting the difficulties western researchers working in the late 1990s faced in replicating a test of the resonance characteristics of sapphire originally conducted by Soviet scientists 20 years earlier. Finally, Vogel discusses the importance of tacit knowledge to the field of biotechnology and argues that the threat of bioweapons may be exaggerated because the open dissemination of explicit knowledge of biotechnology does not, in and of itself, enable would-be proliferators to establish bioweapons programs, without the participation of an individual already steeped in the field's tacit expertise by virtue of participation in biotechnology's community of scientific practice. [1148] Kenney draws similar conclusions in his assessment of organizational learning among violent Islamists in Britain and Spain. He is generally skeptical regarding the value terrorists derive from written instructions and other forms of explicit knowledge, because the dissemination of explicit knowledge via webpages and other technical means has not enabled violent extremists to acquire the practical knowledge necessary to conduct successful attacks. Indeed, Kenney takes the argument one step farther and criticizes the content of the hands-on training terrorists typically receive, because there are often profound gaps in the expertise students acquire during the process, as evidenced by the prevalence of "mistakes and poor tradecraft" (p. 5) among terrorists. Michael Kenney, "Organizational Learning and Islamic Militancy," National Institute of Justice, May 2009; available online: https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/226808.pdf.

Moreover, the national strategy identifies several of the regions on which counterterrorism initiatives must focus if they are to eliminate jihadist safehavens: South Asia, Central Asia, Yemen, Somalia, Iraq, the Sahara, Indonesia, the Philippines, et al. Indeed, it very nearly seems that any developing country with a large Muslim population has substantial potential to serve as a safehaven for violent Islamists. Thus, it is somewhat unrealistic to expect that American counterterrorism initiatives can and should address the still imperfectly understood social, cultural, and economic conditions that cause states to become jihadist safehavens. Efforts to do so constitute nothing short of a call to remake at least one-third of the globe.

There are also tremendous problems with viewing terrorists' need for physical operating space at the regional or national levels, because the evidence suggests that terror training facilities require only a small, impermanent footprint. For example, although the content of the July 21 bombers' instruction was somewhat laughable, they prepared for jihad at a temporary "camp" established inside of a British national park. Similarly, Noordin conducted aspects of the 2005 Bali bombers' training in the cramped loft-space above a restaurant. The history of America's right-wing militias shows the privately-held lands in developed nations can also be used in preparation for violence against the state,[1150] and jihadists have shown periodic interest in purchasing land for similar purposes, as best demonstrated by the efforts that three ideological followers of Abu Hamza al-Masri made to establish a terrorist training center near Bly, Oregon, circa 1999.[1151] In short, even if it were practicable to eliminate the Muslim world's ungoverned regions, terrorists would continue to find physical operating space, because much as the balloon effect dictates that "successful" initiatives against narcotics production merely squeeze drug crops from large open fields into smaller hidden enclaves and neighboring countries,[1152] terror training will not disappear as traditional safehavens evaporate. Instead, terrorists will simply shift their instructional efforts to new, smaller locations.

[1149] Indeed, Weimann suggests that terrorists' ability to post tactical information (much of which is admittedly dangerous) to the Internet is synonymous with online training. Specifically, he states that in addition to serving as a "tool for indoctrination and recruitment" the Internet can serve "as a location for virtual training camps" (p. 110). While his research into the content of terrorist webpages is incredibly detailed, he ultimately fails to examine how this online presence translates into the real world and does not, for example, show that large numbers of successful bombers learned their trade via online training classes. See, Gabriel Weimann, "Virtual Training Camps: Terrorists' Use of the Internet," in James J.F. Forest (ed.), Teaching Terror: Strategic and Tactical Learning in the Terrorist World, (Oxford, UK: Rowman and Littlefield, 2007), pp. 110-132.

Because terror groups face inherent costs and difficulties each time they are forced to move, eliminating established training bases remains a sound policy suggestion, despite its innate limitations. However, the largest security benefits can likely be obtained by combining this policy with one that focuses on removing the individuals who serve as the primary repositories of terrorist knowledge, namely trainers and bomb-makers.[1153] Indeed, the efficacy of Noordin's attack-network declined precipitously after the elimination of master bomb-maker Azahari bin [1153] Jackson, et al, independently reached similar conclusions in their assessment of organizational learning among both Islamist and non-Islamist terror groups. Their policy recommendations included the suggestion that counterterrorism efforts should "identify and target terrorist groups' 'learning leadership.'" Brian A. Jackson, with John C. Husin, as demonstrated by the fact that the time-bomb the 2009 Marriott attackers hid on the hotel's upper floors failed to detonate. Similarly, it seems likely that al-Qaida's campaign of hydrogen peroxide-based bombings could have been entirely avoided if the enigmatic bomb-maker Abu Obaidah al-Masri had been killed prior to the 2005 July bombings. Thus, decapitation campaigns that focus on members of terror groups who hold specialized knowledge, rather than on titular heads of organizations, can maximize the damage to terror groups' capabilities by forcing jihadists to continually re-learn and re-invent the skills necessary to succeed in terrorism. In short, the capture and killing of highly skilled terrorists should take just as great a priority as the elimination of the spaces in which they train new recruits.

However, this recommendation is not a silver bullet, since much of the technical and military knowledge to succeed in terrorism can be diverted from legitimate sources. For example, Ali Mohamed, who conducted both training and surveillance on al-Qaida's behalf in preparation for the 1998 embassy bombings, learned his skills while serving as an officer in the Egyptian Army and later as an enlisted man in the United States Army. Similarly, Yazid Sufaat, a Malaysian member of JI who worked on al-Qaida's behalf in a failed bid to create chemical weapons,[1154] learned his technical skills at the California State University in Sacramento, from which he graduated with a degree in biochemistry in 1987.[1155] Given that future members of the Islamist movement are likely to enter it holding similar skills, the removal of terror groups' key intellectual nodes should be viewed as an ongoing and iterative process, but one that can never entirely purge the jihadist movement of the knowledge necessary to successfully conduct terrorist attacks.

9.3.4 DEGRADE LINKS BETWEEN AL-QAIDA AND ITS AFFILIATES AND ADHERENTS

The recommendations that the National Strategy for Counterterrorism makes in regards to severing links between al-Qaida and the rest of the Islamist terror movement constitute the weakest portion of the report's generally strong policy plan. Analytic error lies at the root of the problem. Because the document neglects to realize that a host of different relationships types may (or may not) connect bin Laden's organization to regional Islamist terror groups, the strategy inevitably discusses these relationships in exaggerative terms, stressing that "Al-Qa'ida senior leaders in Pakistan continue to leverage local and regional affiliates and adherents worldwide through formal and informal alliances to advance their global agenda."[1156]

This overly al-Qaida-centric view of the violent Islamist threat has worrying policy implications. Placing al-Qaida at the movement's rhetorical center fails to adequately recognize that the independent organizations typically referenced as al-Qaida affiliates are dangers in their own right. Indeed, the evidence suggests that there is little reason to suspect that AQIM or AQAP, two of al-Qaida's best known regional affiliates, receive any meaningful support from bin Laden's organization, and since historical training ties constitute AQIM and AQAP's primary non-ideological connection to al-Qaida, it seems that the relationship between these groups becomes more distant each time a counterterrorism strikes removes a former al-Qaida member or former al-Qaida trainee. Therefore, continual targeting of the organization bin Laden founded will do little, if anything, to mitigate these regional groups' access to the resources necessary to conduct terrorism. Simply put, the threat regional terror groups pose to the United States is determined more by their financial and logistical capacity than by the extent of their connection to al-Qaida.

[1156] National Strategy for Counterterrorism, p. 9.

If the threat of Islamist terrorism is, as this study's conclusions strongly suggest, a multi-polar phenomenon, then counterterrorism strategy must evolve beyond its almost single-minded focus on al-Qaida. Part of this necessary adjustment is rhetorical in nature. When scholars and government officials use terms like "al-Qaida linked" and "al-Qaida inspired" haphazardly, they often attribute bin Laden's organization with ownership over people and events with which it has had little to no actual involvement. The term "al-Qaida affiliate" is also often misleading, as the evidence suggests that the extent of regional terror groups' functional involvement with al-Qaida is often miniscule, despite these groups' decision to name themselves in reference to bin Laden's organization. It seems clear that a shift toward more neutral vocabulary is necessary. Terms like "Islamist-motivated" need to be used in lieu of the largely inaccurate references to bin Laden's organization, but if analysts insist on continuing to describe people, groups, and events as "al-Qaida linked," then an explicit and detailed discussion of the nature and depth of the relationship must accompany such references—a task that can be accomplished using the multi-relational ontology outlined in this study.

Concerns over the language currently used to describe the violent Islamist threat are more than pedantic objections. Making continual reference to al-Qaida in descriptions of the jihadist movement supports and advances the narrative violent Islamists want the world to believe, namely that they are part of a single unified front with vast resources, rather than members of distinct organizations whose ability to target the West is frequently constrained by their local access to weapons, personnel, and money. In other words, analysts propagandize on al-Qaida's behalf when then describe unrelated portions of the violent Islamist movement as "linked" to bin Laden's organization. Moreover, this worryingly common practice confuses the security picture, by making it seem that a diverse threat can be stopped by eliminating a single, now largely defunct, organization based in South Asia.

Therefore, a concomitant shift in counterterrorism strategy must accompany changes to the language used to describe the violent Islamist threat. Policy makers need to explicitly recognize that defeating al-Qaida is not synonymous with eliminating the threat posed by jihadists. Many of the same strategies that have proven effective against al-Qaida, including decapitation strategies that focus on key nodes within the organization and efforts to eliminate the means the organization has historically used to access key resources, should now be applied to other terror groups. However, the types of costly and potentially counterproductive ground wars the United States implemented to combat al-Qaida must be avoided, as the nation has neither the will nor the resources to enter into another decade of large-scale armed conflict.

Thus, the National Strategy for Counterterrorism is correct to suggest that a ―whole-of government" approach is the most appropriate means to combat the threat posed by Isalmist terrorism,[1157] but it is important to explicitly stress that the military's role in counterterrorism should be limited. Given its experience in lethal operations such as drone attacks and Special Forces raids, the Armed Forces should take the lead in eliminating the small number of established violent terrorists who can only be dealt with using kinetic means. Intelligence, law enforcement, and the courts must play the dominant roles in the far-larger analytic and prosecutorial aspects of counterterrorism, as continuing to use the military as the primary means to deal with the terrorist threat falsely elevates the violent Islamist threat to the status of a peer competitor to the United States and detracts from the military's ability to secure the nation against traditional state-based threats, which other portions of the government lack the means and ability to combat.[1158] However, as the next two sections discuss in greater detail, cooperative multi-national approaches are also vital to counterterrorism.

9.3.5 COUNTER AL-QAIDA IDEOLOGY AND ITS RESONANCE AND DIMINISH SPECIFIC DRIVERS OF VIOLENCE THAT AL-QAIDA EXPLOITS

The National Strategy for Counterterrorism couches its discourse on counter-radicalization in terms of social, economic, and political development. The crux of the strategy's argument is that by advancing universal human rights (as subjectively defined by the West), applying focused economic aid, and expanding individual political rights through the advancement of democracy, the United States will be able to alleviate the broad factors which underlie the appeal of radicalism.[1159] Such sentiments are popular with policy makers at the highest levels of both political parties; for example, in 2002, George W. Bush argued that "We fight against poverty because hope is an answer to terror,"[1160] and while campaigning in 2007, Barak Obama vowed to "roll back the tide of hopelessness that gives rise to hate," by making "poverty reduction a key part of helping other nations reduce anarchy."[1161] However, the empirical evidence supporting such propositions is shaky.

[1158] The suggestion that the military's role in counterterrorism should be smaller than those played by other portions of government has been widely voiced. For a small, non-representative sample of the relevant citations, see: Paul B. Stares and Mona Yacoubian, "Unconventional Approaches to and Unconventional Threat: A Counter-Epidemic Strategy," in Mapping the Jihadist Threat: The War on Terror Since 9/11, a publication by the Aspen Institute, (June 2006); article available online: http://www.usip.org/files/stares_yacoubian_threat.pdf; Geraint Hughes, The Military's Role in Counterterrorism: Examples and Implications for Liberal Democracies, The Letort Papers, (Carlisle, PA: Strategic Studies Institute, 2011); available online: http://www.strategicstudiesinstitute.army.mil/pdffiles/PUB1066.pdf. Admittedly, a host of academics support the viewpoint espoused by Presidents Bush and Obama. For example, following the 9/11 attacks, Richard Sokolosky and Joseph McMillian, both of the National Defense University, wrote an op-ed for the New York Times, which stated that US could improve national security by providing the Islamic world with "the kind of foreign aid that helps strengthen civil society, provides food and development help, and finances programs for education and health."[1162] Similarly, in 2003, Kim Cragin and Peter Chalk, both of the RAND Corporation, concluded that social and economic development can reduce terrorist recruitment and shrink the size of terrorists' support networks, especially when development initiatives are designed in consultation with community members, so that programs can meet local needs, and these programs are implemented impartially, to prevent dominant socio-cultural groups from advancing themselves at the expense of the politically weak.[1163] Since that time, this viewpoint has become popular; in 2004 Joseph Nye, the Dean of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, called on the U.S. to use soft power (i.e. non-military aspects of national power) to mitigate support for terrorism by providing masses of disenfranchised Muslims with "such things as jobs, education, health care and dignity as they practice their faith,"[1164] and in 2006 Paul B. Stares and Mona Yacobian, both of the U.S. Institute of Peace, argued for social and economic reforms designed to create jobs that will "help to ease popular disaffection, particularly among the (Middle East) region's disproportionately young population."[1165]

Yet, a number of the terrorists featured in this analysis came from comfortable backgrounds and were well-educated. Most famously, Usama bin Laden was a member of one of the wealthiest families in Saudi Arabia. It is similarly well-known that Ayman al-Zawahiri hails from a prominent Egyptian family and holds a medical degree. Moreover, Azahari bin Husin earned a PhD in housing policy, taught classes at Malaysia Technical University, and wrote text books on statistical method, while Yazid Sufaat was a biochemist.

Critics may assert that these individuals are among a small handful of exceptions that prove the broader rule, but a number of statistically-minded researchers conducted broader inquiries that concluded that a nexus between the lack of development and terrorism does not exist.[1166] There are construct validity problems with many of the variables included in these analyses,[1167] but their conclusions still serve to highlight that the true relationships between development and terrorism is unknown. It seems likely that the long-term results of the ongoing Arab Spring are likely to resolve this debate, but since the democratic reforms stemming from this movement are still in their infancy, it would be absurd to draw any conclusions, positively or negatively, regarding their impact to the region's stability or its citizens' propensity to participate in the violent Islamist movement.

Moreover, religion also holds a special appeal for many people that secular considerations are unlikely to replace. Indeed, true Salafists argue that democracy is an affront to their religion, because it attempts to replace god's perfect law, namely Sharia, with man's self-serving innovations.[1168] Thus, there is a substantial likelihood that, at least in the short term, efforts to replicate Western political systems in the Islamic world will exacerbate the likelihood that those on edge of violent extremism will trend toward violent organizations because, somewhat paradoxically, efforts at democratization alienate such fence-sitters from the political discourse.

Given that a global pro-development, pro-democracy agenda is one of the few issues on which the two major political parties are in complete agreement, it is a foregone conclusion that American will continue to attempt to advance western economic and political systems in the Islamic world. However, this effort cannot take place in a cultural vacuum that ignores local religious and cultural traditions. Aside from the rather obvious recommendation that foreign leaders must play significant roles in efforts to design political structures that are well-adapted to individual countries' circumstances,[1169] the United States must find ways to partner with individuals whose religious views explicitly eschew violence, but nonetheless remain inherently appealing to individuals on the fringes of radical Islam.[1170]

A number of Salafist preachers fit this bill. They agree with violent Sunni Islamists' stated desire to create an Islamic caliphate where they can live in strict emulation of the Prophet Mohammed, but also argue that it is illegitimate to use violence in this pursuit, except under very specific conditions that do not include the killing of civilians or the targeting of governments that preside over Muslim-majority countries.[1171] Thus, the U.S. would be well-advised to give voice to these non-violent Salafis, as their message is far more likely to resonate with those currently [1169] This line of reasoning pre-dates the emergence of the Islamist threat. See, for example, Philippe C. Schmitter and Terry Lynn Karl, "What Democracy Is—and Is Not," Journal of Democracy, No. 2 (Summer 1991), pp. 75-88.

[1170] Robert Lambert's research into violent Islam in London independently reached similar conclusions. Specifically, he argues in favor of partnerships "with Muslim groups conventionally deemped to be subversive to democracy" on the logic that non-violent Islamists are in the best position to understand and discredit the ideological arguments of violent Islamists. considering jihad than is secular democracy. After all, the ideological distance between violent Salafism and non-violent Salafism is far shorter than the distance between violent Salafism and the norms of Western political discourse.

But as with most things, the devil of this recommendation lies in the details. Because jihadist fence-sitters typically hold stridently anti-American views, the United States cannot play an overt role in the support of non-violent Salafi ideologues, lest these preachers' religious authority become tainted via affiliation with a country prospective Islamists see as their mortal enemy. Indirect, even clandestine, avenues of support must be adopted, and America's Muslim partner-nations may ultimately be better positioned to exert this type of influence.

9.3.6 BUILD ENDURING COUNTERTERRORISM PARTNERSHIPS AND CAPABILITIES

The ideological considerations discussed in the previous section and the multi-polar nature of Islamist terrorism both dictate that the United States must work cooperatively with a wide assortment of nations in order to effectively combat the terrorist threat. The National Strategy for Counterterrorism explicitly recognizes this need, stating that "Foreign partners are essential to the success of our CT efforts."[1172] However, the policy document glosses over the difficult topic of foreign partners' widely divergent capabilities and speaks only of vague needs to expand governance and strengthen the rule of law.[1173]

This characterization greatly understates the degree of difficulty associated with these recommendations. Many of the nations in the best position to confront Islamist terror groups lie in the developing world. Owing to their poverty, these nations' militaries, intelligence services, and law enforcement communities are typically underpaid, under-staffed, under-equipped, and under-trained. Systemic corruption frequently results and subsequently undermines a host of policy initiatives, including counterterrorism.

The Nairobi police's dealings with Khalid al-Fawwaz, the al-Qaida member who played a key role in the organizations' logistical efforts in East Africa in the early 1990s, offer an archetypical example of the difficulties inherent to partnering with corrupt organizations. Al-Fawwaz and a compatriot were arrested on vague charges in 1994, and then released a few days later, after an attorney paid a bribe equivalent to several thousand dollars to the police. Had the police been as concerned with investigating their detainees as they were with lining their pockets, they might have uncovered al-Qaida's activities in East Africa years prior to the 1998 embassy bombings.

Yet, countries like Kenya cannot be abandoned in the fight against terrorism. Indeed, Kenya's large Muslim population and proximity to Somalia make it a key counterterrorism ally, but until the country's corruption problems are resolved, the efficacy of Kenyan law enforcement is subject to question, as amply demonstrated by the fact that Kenyan cops briefly held the notorious Comorian terrorist Fazul Abdullah Mohammed in custody ahead of the 2002 Mombasa attacks, only to lose him in a bizarre escape. Given that Kenya is by no means unique in its level of corruption, there are substantial practical limitations to the vague efforts at global capacity building outlined by the National Strategy for Counterterrorism.

The United States simply lacks the resources necessary to build counterterrorism capabilities across the whole of the developing world, especially given the current economic climate. It is valid to suggest that counterterrorism could be improved by providing training assistance and limited amounts of equipment to foreign police, intelligence services, and militaries, but given that global partnerships are necessary to manage the threat posed by Islamist terrorism, it would be unrealistic for the United States to expect to achieve true capacity building by acting in isolation. Therefore, efforts to build counterterrorism coalitions must be two-tiered. The United States must convince other wealthy, fully-developed nations to work not only as direct partners in counterterrorism, but also as partners in the provision of training and material support to the less-capable developing nations that play such a vital role in combating terrorism. The scale of the challenge is so great that efforts to elicit support from the developed world need to look beyond America's most obvious partners, such as Britain, Australia, and Canada, and must include secondary powers, such as the Scandinavian countries. In other words, it will take a fairly broad financial coalition to build a truly inclusive counterterrorism coalition.

9.3.7 DEPRIVE TERRORISTS OF THEIR ENABLING MEANS

As it does in regards other aspects of the violent Islamist threat, the National Strategy for Counterterrorism offers sound, but ultimately incomplete, strategies to combat terrorist finance. Specifically, the strategy emphasizes that jihadists receive funding from donations collected primarily in the Gulf region, the exploitation of local economies, and kidnapping for ransom.[1174] All of these elements are vital, but the evidence strongly suggests that terrorists will continue to have the ability to finance attacks even if all of these major funding sources are eliminated.

The first mitigating factor is the low cost of most terror attacks. Although the 9/11 attacks cost somewhere between $400,000 and $500,000, the upper estimate for the cost of the July 7, 2005, London bombings was $8,500. Zazi's 2009 attempt on the New York City subway likely cost no more than a few thousand dollars; the 2009 Little Rock shootings were financed on a shoe-string budget using only the wages earned from a low-paying job with a tour-bus company, and even the massive 2002 Bali bombings were less than $25,000. It will remain impossible to stop terrorists from saving or otherwise acquiring the fairly small sums of money necessary to conduct the type of attacks which have become commonplace in the decade since 9/11, particularly if the attackers plan to use suicide-tactics. After all, those who plan to die as _martyrs' have no reason to avoid ruining their credit and bankrupting themselves in order to conduct an operation.

Moreover, small-scale crimes play an under-recognized role in the finance of terrorism. Although the cases discussed in this analysis were not selected with crime in mind, revenue generated by illegal means other than kidnapping featured prominently across the categories of the Baleian typology, suggesting that criminal finance is an incredibly common feature of the contemporary jihadist threat. Fazul's participation in robbery and credit card fraud to support the 2002 Mombasa attacks and Siddique Khan's fraudulent obtainment of bank loans to finance the July 7, 2005, London bombings demonstrate that events strongly tied to al-Qaida have benefitted from criminal finance, regardless of if the events occurred inside or outside of the West. Similarly, Noordin's accomplices in Indonesia robbed banks and stores to support operations including the 2002 Bali bombings, the 2004 Australian embassy bombing, and the 2005 Bali bombings. Clearly, the proceeds of crime also supported events weakly tied to al-Qaida. AQIM's exploits in smuggling show that the same conclusion applies to former members of bin Laden's organization, and although all of the individuals this analysis discussed in relation to al-Qaida-inspired attacks financed their attacks using personal savings, it is fairly easy to find other examples which demonstrate that jihadists who lack functional ties to established terror groups also frequently self-finance through crime. For example, in 2005, police in California captured a small group of extremists who followed the teachings of Kevin James, an inmate at California's Folsom prison who invented his own Islamist theology,[1175] after they robbed several gas stations in-and-around Los Angeles to generate funds for attacks they were planning against military and Jewish targets in southern California.[1176] In short, there is strong evidence demonstrating that terrorist finance is intimately tied to moderately-organized crime.

Given that police already make tremendous efforts to eliminate crime for its own sake, there is little sense in making the bland recommendation to increase anti-crime initiatives in the name of counterterrorism, especially considering the limitations imposed by the current budgetary climate. Thus, efforts to mitigate terrorists' access to criminally-generated funds must be about doing more with currently available resources. The most realistic solution is ultimately a simple one: increase awareness at all levels of American and international law-enforcement regarding the nexus between terrorism and criminal-finance. If police officers the world over know that some suspects who appear to be petty criminals are actually terrorists who committed their crime in an effort to generate funding for an attack, then investigators are more likely to pursue lines of inquiry that may head-off prospective attacks early in their development.[1177]

However, the utility of this recommendation is still likely limited, because even police who are fully aware of links between crime and terrorism must first catch those responsible for the crimes for this knowledge to be of any use—an especially difficult challenge considering that in this document, though it is worth noting that James heavily sites Ibn Tamiyyah, a 12th century theorist who also appears frequently in al-Qaida's theological pronouncements. Ultimately, James and al-Qaida independently arrived at similar conclusions after reviewing overlapping sources. For the specifics of James's beliefs, see: Kevin James, The JIS Protocol, 1997 (revised 2002); available online: http://nefafoundation.org/file/FeaturedDocs/U.S._v_James_JISManifesto.pdf.

[1177] Hamm's research, which considered patterns of criminal involvement among terrorists subscribing to a host of religious and political ideologies, reached similar conclusions. Specifically, he argued that "the most successful method of both detecting and prosecuting cases of terrorism is through the pursuit of conventional criminal investigations. . . . the best practices of investigators should be directed to crimes that facilitate the operation of complex organizations . . . . (because) all terrorist organizations require money, material, trainsportation, identity documents, communication systems, and safe havens to accomplish their aims." Mark S. Hamm, "Crimes Committed by Terrorist Groups: Theory, Research and Prevention," Final Report Submitted to the National Institute of Justice, Washington, D.C, September 2005; available online: https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/211203.pdf.

only a tiny share of the billions of small crimes committed around the world each year will be linked to terror. In short, jihadists' increasing involvement in crime dictates that the finance of terrorism is a fairly intractable problem.

9.4 THE LIMITS OF COUNTERTERRORISM

Although the recommendations offered by this analysis touch on several diverse domains, they are share a common trait: all of them can mitigate, rather than solve, the threat of Islamist terrorism. Indeed, perfect solutions to the problem of terrorism do not exist, especially not in open societies that prize freedom of movement, freedom of speech, and other personal liberties that extremists can pervert to advance their illegitimate ends. Therefore, this analysis closes by echoing a conclusion reached by virtually every serious inquiry into terrorism, namely that some level of non-state violence against civilians is unavoidable. Americans must recognize that although Islamist terrorism can be greatly curtailed, it can never be entirely defeated.

APPENDIX A: EXAMPLE OF INTERVIEW QUESTIONNAIRE

Note: This questionnaire was administered to Richard Barnes, the Deputy Mayor of London and the former deputy chairman of London's Metropolitan Police Authority, on the subject of the July 2005 London Bombings.

1. Prior to 2005, what threats did the city construe as the primary dangers to London in terms of security?

2. Has this perception changed since 2005?

3. Where did terrorism rank among these threats prior to 2005?

4. Do you believe that the ranking of terrorism among security threats to London has changed since 2005? How?

5. Prior to 2005, what, if any, specific terror groups or ideologies were of greatest concern to the city of London?

6. How much information on Islamist groups did law enforcement or intelligence communicate to the city of London government prior to the 2005 attacks?

7. The next section deals with some of your individual beliefs about terrorism. Prior to the 2005 attacks, how did you personally perceive the threat that terrorism posed to London?

8. Prior to 2005, what were your personal views about the relative dangers posed by the threats the City of London faced?

9. What organizations, if any, do you think bear responsibility for the actions of the 2005 bombers? Why?

10. The report that you chaired focuses quite a bit on communications technology in the response to disaster. Can you comment on the status of the updates you recommended?

11. Specifically, can you discuss the –Connect Project"?

12. The report that you chaired did not discuss much about preventive measures, and how they could mitigate the potential impact of attacks. Are there any improvements to physical security for mass transit, public buildings, land marks, etc. that you would recommend be implemented in the name of anti-terrorism?

13. How effective is London's CCTV network at preventing attacks?

14. How effective is CCTV for determining responsibility for attacks after the fact, as an investigative tool?

15. Where do you strike the balance between security and privacy?

16. Do you think that there are any other lessons that my questions haven't touched on, that you believe should be learned from 7/7?

APPENDIX B: AGENTS AND ALIASES

A Note on Interpretation: The lack of clear naming conventions for those involved with violent Islamism makes it impossible to list the individuals included in the dataset alphabetically. Several individuals are more widely known by their alias than their real name; the Indonesian extremist Hambali, whose given name is Nurjaman Riduan bin Isamuddin, offers one example. Those searching for him under the letter ―H" would have a great difficulty finding him if he were listed under his given name, and vice versa. Conversely, other individuals are known to Western observers by their given name, rather than an alias, which may be more popular among the subject's Islamist peers. There are also individuals who are widely referenced by multiple aliases; for example, some analysts prefer to reference Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, the Comorian extremist who played a key role in the 1998 embassy bombings and the 2002 Mombassa attacks, as ―Fazul," while others prefer ―Harun" or ―Harun Fazul." In other cases, an individual's given name is entirely unknown, as is the case with the Egyptian bomb-maker Abu Obaidah al-Masri, the man who trained several individuals involved in attacks on London in the mid-2000s.

Aliases are also difficult because there are few rules regarding their assignment. Some names resonate with Islamist extremists because of their prominence in the history of the Muslim religion; consequently, a number of individuals adopt the name in an effort to demonstrate their piety. Moreover, Muslim parents often adopt a new pseudonym with the birth of their first child. ―Abu," meaning ―father of," and ―Um," meaning ―mother of" are often prefixed to the name of the child in order to create a non-distinct, culturally derived nickname. Given the commonality of the name ―Mohammed," one shudders to think how many Muslim men have adopted ―Abu Mohammed" as a pseudonym. However, at other times, an ―Abu name" is adopted as an alias in its own right, without reference to the parenting of a child. In concert, these factors dictate cautious interpretation of the data; several different individuals may use the same alias. Context is incredibly important in determining whether or not two people with the same name are actually distinct agents.

Adding yet another level of complexity to the seemingly simple task of alphabetizing names is the problem of transliteration. There are no hard-and-fast rules about how to spell Arabic-language names in English. Although the name ―Mohammed" has a single spelling in the original Arabic (محمد), the name can also come into English as ―Muhammad" or ―Mohamed." Other letters, such as jeem (ج), come into English quite differently depending on the translator's regional accent. Egyptians pronounce jeem as a ―G," while speakers hailing form the Levant typically pronounce the same letter as ―J.‖ Since most transliterations are based on the translator‘s attempt to use the Roman alphabet to emulate the sound of the word in the original language, the translator‘s accent ultimately determines spelling.

In combination with the extensive practice of aliasing and the ambiguity inherent to data on the subject of terrorism, these factors dictate that the choice and spelling of the primary name used to reference individuals in the data is somewhat arbitrary. They are provided in this appendix to make the data ―human readable,‖ and in lieu of an impossible alphabetical listing, the individuals listed below are ordered according to their unique identification number. Gaps in the sequencing of identification numbers are meaningless, as the numbers merely provide a unique identifier on which to reconcile the various names used to reference agents. Those searching for specific individuals are advised to conduct a ―control f‖ search on the desired term. It may also be necessary to conduct searches on alternate spellings, and it is worth mentioning that ―control f‖ searches process hyphenated and un-hyphenated terms differently.

Finally, space limitations preclude a recounting of the thousands of sources used to reconcile names and aliases. As the list of aliases was generated by deductive observation of the sources listed in Appendix H, which lists the interactions associated with each individual in the data, a reasonable approximation of the sourcing underlying the alias list can be derived from that appendix.

APPENDIX C: MODELED MEMBERSHIP OVER TIME

A Note on Interpretation: The difficulty of displaying more than two decades worth of membership data in a readable format required some accommodations, including the use of diminutive font and abbreviations. The letter ―x" indicates that, for a given year, an individual did not appear in the data used to model membership. The number ―0" indicates that, for a given year, an individual did appear in that data, but the modeling process failed to locate them in a named organization. The majority of the abbreviations used to represent organizations are both intuitive and widely used; however, as a handful are non-standard, readers are encouraged to review the list below, which includes all abbreviations used to reference organizations, prior to viewing the table containing information on agents' modeled membership. Finally, because of the blurry lines that exist between insurgency and terror, this appendix also includes information on a handful of organizations that were beyond the scope of this inquiry's effort to model Sunni Islamist-motivated terror groups. Data on unmodeled organizations was taken at face value from the original data, and parentheses are used to clearly distinguish these unmodeled characterizations from the characterizations derived from the formal membership model. For example, whenever the raw data explicitly referenced someone as a member of the Taliban—an unmodeled organization—they appear in the table below as ―(Tal)."

APPENDIX D: AGENT ATTRIBUTES

Note on Interpretation: All dates listed in this appendix are in yyyymmdd format. Because of the ambiguity inherent to the subject matter, these dates should be interpreted as approximate. Often times, dates of birth are listed only to the year, e.g. 1977. In such instances, the date was set to the midpoint of the calendar year; thus, 1977 becomes 19770702. Similarly, when the data listed dates only to the month, e.g. November 1977, attribute values were set to the midpoint of the month, e.g. 19771115. As with the alias list, space precludes a full recounting of the thousands of sources used to compile the attributes listed in the table below, but as the information was obtained through deductive observation of the sources listed in Appendix H, which lists the interactions associated with each individual in the data, a reasonable approximation of the sourcing underlying the attribute data can be derived from that appendix.

APPENDIX E: EVENT ATTRIBUTES

Note on Interpretation: With the exception of the variables listing the date of events, the number of victims killed in completed attacks, the number of individuals injured in completed attacks, and the number of functional interactions recorded for each event, the attributes listed in this appendix are all coded as binary dummy variables. Per standard coding practice, values of ~~"1~~" indicate the presence of a condition, and values of ~~"0~~" indicate the absence of a condition. Attribute titles are self-explanatory, and thematically related variables have been grouped and color coded. Events are ordered by date of occurrence. As with the agent attributes, space considerations preclude a full recounting of the thousands of sources used to derive this information; however, a reasonable approximation of the sourcing underlying the attribute data on events can be derived from Appendix H.

APPENDIX F: LIST OF EVENTS DIVIDED BY BALEIAN CATEGORY AND ORDERED BY YEAR

A Note on interpretation: Although the numbers included in the tables below have the appeal of hard statistics, cautious interpretation is vital. Aside from the obvious impact that incomplete data has on the grouping process that underlies this statistical estimate, the numbers may sometimes understate organization's involvement by excluding indirect support. Individuals involved in the Islamist extremist movement often assist other jihadists without knowing the exact purpose of their help. In large part, this ignorance is willful and deliberate, since it prevents logistical supporters on the periphery of an attack from providing authorities with information that might compromise an operation. However, this safeguard also obfuscates historical studies of terrorism; it is sometimes impossible to pair monies and materiel to specific attacks even after events enter the open-source record. Consequently, some important participants in terror attacks may remain two steps removed from an incident, and the tables above may understate the involvement of some organizations in events.

Issues of scale also complicate efforts to estimate organizational responsibility for attacks, especially as they pertain to the finance of terrorism. Although monetary transactions vary greatly in their amount, the estimative process treats all interactions as equal. For example, the model treats KSM's negligible financing of his nephew Ramzi Yousef's 1993 attack on the World Trade Center—KSM wired 660 USD into an account used by the conspirators[1178]—as identical to the tens of thousands of dollars that KSM helped to funnel to the 9/11 attackers to support their training and living expenses in the U.S.[1179] Metrics for evaluating the scale of operational ties to an attack are less clear, because it is, for example, debatable whether an attack planner or the triggerman who detonated a blast played a greater role, but regardless of the actual answer, the weight of operational interactions certainly varies in ways that the estimate does not take into account. Unfortunately, ambiguities inherent to the field of terrorism research prevent these scaling issues from being adequately resolved, because the true financial cost of terror attacks is rarely, if ever, known, and the total Ekman, "Tracing terror's roots," U.S. News and World Report, February 24, 2003; Terry Mcdermott, "The mastermind; Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and the making of 9/11," The New Yorker, September 13, 2010; 9/11 Commission Report.

[1179] 9/11 Commission Report weight and number of individual‘s operational interactions can only be partially reconstructed, even when using the best sources available.

In the end, the estimates of operational involvement should be read in broad terms. There is a substantial difference between al-Qaida‘s 43.33 percent involvement in the 1997 Luxor Massacre, in which armed gunmen targeted tourists visiting Egyptian historical sites, and the organization‘s total responsibility for the following year‘s bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi. However, there is little reason to assume that al-Qaida‘s 38.89 percent involvement in the 2001 plot against the U.S. Embassy in Paris indicates substantially more organizational responsibility than the terror group‘s 37.5 percent involvement in the same year‘s bombing of the Atrium Mall in Jakarta, irrespective of the Paris plot‘s 1.39 percentage edge. Simply put, this estimate cannot be approached in the same way as more familiar statistics derived from physical measurements or economic data.

Small values are not, however, always irrelevant. They may indicate organizations that provided indirect support by virtue of shared members, or, in the case of the Taliban, by providing the physical sanctuary necessary to prepare for events in lands far removed from the actual attack. Moreover, small values can indicate organizations that merit close monitoring, because they may share additional ties not yet in evidence. Finally, when small values appear alongside an unexpected partner organization, it may indicate burgeoning organizational partnerships that herald future patterns of functional cooperation, especially when these measurements occurred in years that only recently drew to a close.
